PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 15, 1916.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, may Thy grace be vouchsafed to us this day, that we may discharge the duties that are before us in Thy fear. We pray for Thy grace, for we have come short of Thy glory, and can only look to Thee for Thy guidance and blessing through Thine infinite love, through the riches of Thy grace. We pray that Thou wilt give to us power to perform our duty, courage to be just to our fellow men, and wisdom that we may understand how to adjust the conflicting interests of men, that peace and brotherhood and love may abide with us, a united Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sterling
Brady	Hughes	Oliver	Stone
Brandegee	Husting	Overman	Swanson
Bryan	James	Phelan	Taggart
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pomerene	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Shafroth	Tillman
Culberson	Lane	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lippitt	Sherman	Williams
Curtis	McLean	Simmons
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENYON] is necessarily absent. I make the announcement for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. COLT and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now that there is a quorum, I will state that the conference committee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill is in session, and that is one reason why we were a little tardy.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 13982) to extend temporarily the time for filing applications and fees and taking action in the United States Patent Office in favor of nations granting reciprocal rights to United States citizens, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6369) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HUGHES, Mr. TAGGART, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here a statement of William G. Crocker, chairman of the Millers' National Federation. It is a short statement with reference to the Rainey bill for the repeal of the mixed-flour law. I ask to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILLERS' NATIONAL FEDERATION,
Minneapolis, Minn., August 12, 1916.

RAINEY BILL (H. R. 9409) FOR THE REPEAL OF THE MIXED-FLOUR LAW.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GRONNA: As you will recall, the hearing on this bill occupied the week ending February 5, 1916. No action has ever been taken by the committee, but we are advised that it has been called for Tuesday, the 15th.

Herewith please find a statement of the writer's testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, which summarizes the whole thing in a nutshell.

This repeal would be most pernicious. Won't you kindly take the time Monday, the 14th, to use your influence with the members of the Ways and Means Committee and vigorously oppose this measure?

Thanking you in advance for your attention,

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM G. CROCKER,
Director Millers' National Federation.

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM G. CROCKER, REPRESENTING THE MILLERS' CLUB OF MINNEAPOLIS, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., BEFORE THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 5, 1916, IN OPPOSITION TO THE SO-CALLED RAINEY BILL (H. R. 9409) ON MIXED FLOUR.

Mr. RAINEY. Whom do you represent?

Mr. CROCKER. The Millers' Club of Minneapolis, the same association that Mr. Snyder represents.

Mr. RAINEY. How much time do you want?

Mr. CROCKER. A very few minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Will you be through in 15 minutes if we do not ask you any questions?

Mr. CROCKER. If you do not ask me any questions I will be through in five minutes.

I shall speak of this matter rather from the ethical standpoint than the scientific standpoint.

I have been in the milling business for 34 years, but I am not a chemist nor a practical miller. What I am is an operating miller.

Considerable has been said here about the merits of Michigan wheat and what it has done for various people. I am simply here to represent the northwestern wheat, and I want to take this opportunity to thank our opponents for the high words of praise accorded our flour, and in fact the splendid compliment paid to all flour, namely, that it is too good, and the quality, therefore, from their standpoint should be lowered.

Why repeal the so-called mixed-flour law? Who is asking for its repeal? Is the consumer asking for it; that is, the family or the baker? Is the wheat miller asking for it? Most certainly not; and why not? Because he is producing the cheapest and best food for the price and at the smallest possible margin; because it is an industry that is highly competitive and absolutely free from agreements or combinations; because flour always has been considered the staff of life and as dependable as sterling silver. When the buyer asks for flour, he wants flour, because he knows that it will give him better results than any mixture or compound. He wants the real thing. There is only one real thing in flour, and that is flour.

It seems to me that the ones most interested in this proposed repeal are those who think they would be benefited by its repeal, namely, the maker or seller of the adulterant. The repeal of the present law would bring about most pernicious results and open the way for the lowering of the standard of breadstuffs. This is no flight of the imagination, but an absolute condition confronting this great industry.

Who wants this repeal? If the corn people wish to increase the human consumption of corn products, let them inaugurate a campaign of education. They can not make people eat corn, because the people want flour; and by that I mean wheat flour. Corn, excepting in a small way, is not human food but stock food or feed.

Now, when we come to cornstarch, we find a different condition. We have heard that seven refining companies grind upward of 56,000,000 bushels of corn annually. There is one milling company in Minneapolis which grinds annually upward of 56,000,000 bushels of wheat into the staff of life. The repeal of this bill would mean legalized adulteration or deception.

And I framed those words before I heard Dr. Wiley yesterday.

The people greatly interested are the refineries which wish to find a market for this by-product, cornstarch. All this talk about corn flour and corn meal is all poppy-cock; it all simmers down to cornstarch. This little booklet we have here refers very suavely to corn flour, but the whole meat in the nut is cornstarch.

The inclusion in flour of this product would reduce the quantity of wheat ground in the same amount. It strikes me that the advocates of corn and corn by-products want the millers of wheat flour "to pull their chestnuts out of the fire." Let me assure you, gentlemen, that were this fine corn meal and cornstarch or flourine, or whatever you may call this by-product, secured chemically in the manufacture of glucose, not white in color, this repeal would not be under consideration. Were this stuff pink or gray or blue, or yellow like cottonseed meal, we would not be here to-day. If this stuff is so good, why will the bakers not use it? If these people want to increase their business, why not put up cornstarch in 49-pound sacks or in 24-pound sacks and sell it to the grocers and start a campaign of education? The millers have had to educate the people up to the use of spring wheat against winter wheat. If the public wants cheaper food, why don't they do that? I will tell you why: They won't use it because they know, and know absolutely, that it will not produce satisfactory results. If the people want cheaper flour, they can get it in the low grades, which are perfectly nutritious, but of inferior or darker color.

The man who attempts the exportation of this proposed flour mixed with cornstarch would be a very sorry exporter, because the foreign markets will take nothing but pure flour. Do we want to kill our export flour business of from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 barrels annually, which means labor for those employed? Do we want to take a step backward? Do we want to make deception easy, for that is what it means Do we want to lower our standards? I do not believe that we do. I do not believe that the people want it. The bakers oppose this repeal and the millers oppose this repeal, because it is vicious and wrong, and the family consumer doesn't know that his daily bread is in jeopardy.

That is all I have to say, and that is the whole meat in the nutshell.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank you very much. That is one of the best statements that has been made, both on account of its intrinsic merit and its brevity.

Mr. OLIVER presented a petition of sundry citizens of West Auburn, Pa., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bakersfield, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pomona, Cal., praying for the settlement of the difficulties between the railroads and their employees by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 5450) to amend section 108, chapter 5, of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 791) thereon.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5916) authorizing an investigation to determine the true north and west boundaries of the Warm Springs Reservation, in Oregon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 792) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 6863) to authorize the appointment of Levin H. Campbell, jr., second lieutenant, Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army, as a first lieutenant in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 6864) providing for the continuance of the Osage Indian School, Oklahoma, for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1917; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

TARGET PRACTICE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 250), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate a statement of the number of shots fired and the number of hits made by the Atlantic Battleship Fleet in division practice and battle practice in 1916 as they appeared on the screen target as allowed by the umpire at the time.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CIVIL-SERVICE REQUIREMENTS.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to Senate resolution 246, offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] yesterday, regarding exemptions from the civil service under Executive order. I ask that the amendment lie on the table and be printed, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Add at the end of the resolution the following:

"Also a similar list of the Executive orders issued during each administration prior thereto, beginning with the first administration of President Cleveland, exempting appointees in the Federal service from civil-service requirements or placing employees under the civil service previously appointed outside of any eligible list prescribed by the Civil Service Commission."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5202) to authorize the maintenance and operation of dams across the St. Croix River at Baileyville and Grand Falls, Me., with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ST. CROIX RIVER DAMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5202) to authorize the maintenance and operation of dams across the St. Croix River at Baileyville and Grand Falls, Me., which was to strike out the preamble.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. JONES. I submitted Senate resolution 248 yesterday. I desire to call it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, coming over from the preceding day.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 248, submitted yesterday by Mr. JONES, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the information called for by Senate resolution 133 of March 16, 1916, or report to the Senate promptly why such information can not be furnished.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, some days ago there was messaged over from the House Senate bill 19, commonly known as the bill of lading bill, which passed the House with certain amendments. I ask that that may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with perhaps two exceptions, these amendments are of minor importance. After conferring with a number of my colleagues on the Interstate Commerce Committee, I think I express their views as well as my own when I say that we would have preferred to have had the bill in the form that it passed the Senate, but we realized after conferring with Members of the House, particularly with members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, that if we were to disagree to the amendments made in the House it would be next to impossible to have any final legislation upon this subject at the present session. It is our belief, after an exchange of views, that it would be very much better for the Senate to concur in the amendments adopted by the House, and if future experience should indicate that further legislation is desirable we can then introduce other bills anew to remedy what may seem to be the defects in the bill as it passed the House.

I therefore move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have received a great many letters in protest against the amendments offered to the bill in the House. I did not expect the bill to be brought up for action this morning, and I did not bring those letters with me to the Chamber. If the bill is going to be considered now, I should like to have the amendments read and see just what they are. In the meantime perhaps I shall get my correspondence here.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that probably the objections that have been called to the Senator's attention have also been called not only to my attention but to that of other members of the committee. They relate particularly to section 21, the subject matter of which is "shipper's weight, load, and count." I think I would agree with the Senator that we would very much prefer the shipper's load-and-count provision contained in the bill as passed by the Senate, but it is going to be impossible to get a quorum in the other House to consider this matter if it goes to conference, as we are told.

The bill does not take effect by its terms until January 1, 1917, and meanwhile an opportunity will be given everyone to investigate this subject further; and if the objections are well taken, then I, for one, will be very glad to do everything I can to secure additional legislation in harmony with section 21 as it passed the Senate.

This measure is so comprehensive in its terms and involves so many questions that the friends of the measure feel they are now getting practically 98 per cent of what they want; and we have gotten along so far with it that it would be little short of a calamity to the business public if we did not allow this measure to go through.

I know that our committee labored in season and out of season in order to get this bill perfected, and it has been a matter of serious study by all the business interests of the country, covering a period of 10 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that section 21 was one of the provisions of the bill to which there was serious objection on the part of those who have communicated with me.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt the Senator is right as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. There were two or three other provisions of the bill mentioned by my correspondents, but I have not the bill before me and I can not therefore at the moment point them out. I desire, however, to ask the Senator if the Committee on Interstate Commerce has considered the amendments made by the House to the Senate bill and if the committee is a unit in agreeing to the acceptance of the House amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can not say that. The committee, as a committee, has not considered the House amendments as they have come over. I have, however, presented the matter, for instance, to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]; the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has also taken the matter into consideration, and my recollection is that I had some little talk with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] on the subject, although I will not state that as a fact, but so far as I was able to learn, I thought that we were substantially agreed that it would be for the best interests of the public at large if the bill could go through as it passed the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was very much in favor of the bill as it passed the Senate. I know the necessity for the legislation, and I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] if the amendments of the House are acceptable to him, as he has given the subject a great deal of attention.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the House amendment as to section 21 is as good as the Senate bill. Has the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] stated the difference between them?

Mr. POMERENE. I did not state that specifically, and I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The difference is this: In the Senate bill it was provided that at any place where goods are loaded and the carrier maintains an agency, the shipper could call upon the carrier to count and weigh the goods, and when that opportunity was given to the carrier, it was made unlawful for the carrier to stamp the bill of lading with the words, "Shipper's weight, load, and count"; and the railroad company would under those circumstances be liable in just the same way as though it had originally weighed, loaded, and counted the goods.

The Senate provision was intended to make the bill of lading a more substantial basis for credit in the markets of the country. The House has excepted from that provision quite a variety of conditions. That is, the House provides—

> That when package freight or bulk freight is loaded by a shipper, and the goods are described in a bill of lading merely by a statement of marks or labels upon them or upon packages containing them, or by a statement that the goods are said to be goods of a certain kind or quantity, or in a certain condition, or it is stated in the bill of lading that packages are said to contain goods of a certain kind or quantity or in a certain condition, or that the contents or condition of the contents of packages are unknown, or words of like purport are contained in the bill of lading, such statements, if true, shall not make liable the carrier issuing the bill of lading, although the goods are not of the kind or quantity or in the condition which the marks or labels upon them indicate, or of the kind or quantity or in the condition they were said to be by the consignor. The carrier may also by inserting in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport, indicate that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him; and if such statement be true—

That is, the statement that the goods were loaded by the shipper—

> the carrier shall not be liable for damages caused by the improper loading or by the nonreceipt or by the misdescription of the goods described in the bill of lading.

Then, this proviso has been inserted:

> Provided, however, Where the shipper of bulk freight installs and maintains adequate facilities for weighing such freight, and the same are available to the carrier, then the carrier, upon written request of such shipper and when given a reasonable opportunity so to do, shall ascertain the kind and quantity of bulk freight within a reasonable time after such written request, and the carriers shall not in such cases insert in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight," or other words of like purport, and if so inserted contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

It will be observed that the difference is that the Senate bill provides that, wherever a carrier maintains an agency, the shipper may call upon the carrier to examine the goods, to count them, to weigh them, and when that opportunity is given, the bill of lading can not contain the exception which the law attaches to "shipper's load, weight, and count." The House bill, as will be observed, takes out a great many instances which would fall within the scope of the Senate bill. I do not believe, therefore, that the House bill is as good as the Senate bill. It will not give the bill of lading that authenticity and standing in the markets which the Senate bill would.

But the bill is a part of a codification of the law with regard to bills of lading and is of the greatest importance. It has been composed with the utmost care and has been urged upon Congress for many years by those who are deeply interested in sustaining the credit of bills of lading, and I think it would be vastly better to pass the bill as amended by the House than not to pass it at all, in the belief on my part that when the time comes and this weakening of the bill becomes apparent, it will be easier to amend it than it will be to pass the original measure. I am, therefore, in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Ohio, if he thinks that is a better way of accomplishing the result than to have a conference committee appointed to consider the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I may say——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. I will be through in a moment. Apropos of what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, I would have very much preferred section 21 of the Senate bill on this subject, and was so anxious that we might be able to get that, or nearly that, in the final form that the bill might take, that I took the matter up with Members of the House in whose judgment I had every confidence. It seems, however, that there are certain Members of the House, as I understand, who insist very strenuously upon section 21 as it passed the House and who intimate that if that amendment is not allowed to stand and remain a part of the bill, a point of no quorum will be raised in that body, which, in the present parliamentary situation, would make it utterly impossible to get this legislation through.

It seems to me that if we could get only one provision of this bill passed we ought to waive everything else and let it be passed. I refer to that provision which seeks to correct the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in the so-called Friedlander case. The substance of the holding in that case was that if a freight agent were to issue a bill of lading for goods and did not receive the goods therefor the railroad company would not be held responsible. Because of the doctrine in this case and in previous cases upon that subject, frauds aggregating millions of dollars have been perpetrated upon the public, not only in this country but in our foreign commerce as well.

As the Senator from Iowa has said, this is not a new proposition. It is the outgrowth of probably 10 years' study upon this subject of uniform legislation. First, the American Bar Association took up the subject and prepared the bill of lading to apply to the several States, and up to date that bill has been passed and has become a law in 15 of the leading commercial States of the Union.

Now, this bill is the old State bill, transformed so as to make it applicable to interstate and foreign commerce. I do not think that we would be serving the public if we were to hesitate about having this finally enacted in the form that it comes from the other House, even though we are not entirely satisfied with its provisions. As I feel now on this subject, I so much favor the Senate provision, section 21, that I should be very glad to take that up with those who are interested in the subject, with the view of securing a modification of section 21 later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I was very heartily in favor of the bill which the committee prepared, and which passed the Senate; and I very much regret the amendments made by the other House, so far as I am able to understand them, as stated on the floor of the Senate this morning.

The Senator from Ohio is mistaken as to his recollection about having discussed these amendments with me.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I did not state that as a fact. I stated it merely as an impression; and I think the Senator from Connecticut is perhaps right in his present statement about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator from Ohio did not state it as a fact. He stated that he was under the impression that he had discussed the matter with me; but he is mistaken about that. This is the first information I have ever had about the House amendments. However, I care nothing about that feature of it.

I simply want to call attention to this: Here is an amendment made by the other House, to which the Senate committee entirely disagrees, upon a very important bill. I regret very much that the Senator from Ohio, in his anxiety to get through this very meritorious piece of legislation, feels compelled to yield by the fact that there is no quorum in the other House, and that some one who believes in the amendment that the House has made, without any attempt to confer with the Senate conferees, announces in advance that, unless the Senate agrees with an amendment in which it does not believe, he will raise the question of a quorum in the House, and thereby perhaps defeat the whole legislation. I think it is regrettable that, Congress being in session, such a parliamentary situation should exist. I had at first expected, before the Senator made that statement, to ask the Senator to withdraw his motion that the Senate concur in the House amendments, let the Senate disagree to the House amendments, let conferees be appointed, and see if, by force of reason and argument, the Senate conferees could not bring the House conferees to an agreement with the Senate view; and I am not yet entirely persuaded that that course would not be preferable.

I am not going to insist upon it, however, because I realize the Senator from Ohio is the author of this legislation; that he has pressed it diligently for several years, and I do not feel sufficiently accountable to interfere with what he thinks is the best course under the circumstances.

My personal belief is that the intimation that the point of a lack of a quorum might be raised in the other House might not be carried into effect. I think, if the Senate should appoint conferees, that the House would appoint conferees, and that there is a possibility at least, the amount of which I am not able to judge at the present time, that we might agree. Even if we did not agree, Mr. President, this would come back to us when the Senator from Ohio and his fellow conferees decided that there was no hope of having the House recede from its amendments and concur with the bill as it passed the Senate. The Senator from Ohio could then report back to the Senate, recommending that the Senate then agree to the House amendments. Being a conference report, it would always be in order to be made, and being a question upon which there would be no debate and on which the Senate could act then just as well as now—it would not take two minutes—I should think the Senator from Ohio would feel justified in at least making the effort, and I think there would be no reason at all for losing the legislation. The Senator from Ohio would then feel that he had exhausted the last resource in the way of obtaining what he really thinks would be the best legislation.

I shall not oppose the Senator's motion, however, but I had hoped that he could see that it would be worth while to make that effort, and that his view that the legislation would necessarily be imperiled thereby, or possibly be imperiled, might be modified.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I cheerfully bear witness to the very great interest which the Senator from Connecticut has taken in this measure. We had the benefit of his very large experience and his very great legal ability in shaping it up, and I would feel disposed now to yield the point and to accept his suggestion were it not for the fact that I have satisfied myself, after various intervews with Members of the House and others who have been in conference with them, that it would be impossible for us to get them to yield upon this subject. It is for that reason that I made the motion to concur, and I still feel that it is the best that we can do at this session of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, after the statement made by the Senator from Ohio I am not going to object to the consideration of the report; but it does seem to me that it is worth while for us to make an effort, at least, to have the House recede on section 21 and one or two of the other minor amendments.

I want to say to the Senator that I have been informed this morning that not only the Democratic Members of the House but the Republican Members of the House have been notified to return to Washington; and as I came to the office this morning at 7.30 a train came in, and I noticed that about 20 or 30 of them arrived here this morning. I will further say that even if the Senate had to yield it would be just as well to yield in conference as to yield here upon the floor without a conference; and I do not believe that if we had conferees appointed it would prevent the passage of the bill at this session of Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt, while I do not feel free to quote the Member I have in mind, only yesterday I had a talk with one of the prominent Members of the House who infinitely preferred the Senate provision to this, and he expressed it as his judgment that it would be necessary for the Senate to accept these amendments if we were to have any legislation at this session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, Mr. President, that at best can be only the judgment of one Member of the House.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, surely.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And I have known even very obdurate Members to change their minds after matters had been properly laid before them. I do not think the Senator ought to allow that one prominent Member to defeat the effort to accomplish what the Senate believes in, especially when we stand to lose nothing, as the Senator from Utah says. If we have to yield in the end, it is no worse than yielding now. We have nothing to lose, and we may possibly gain something.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize the very laudable purpose that the Senator from Connecticut and others have in mind; and I feel, too, that their request is not an unreasonable one. I do not want to seem to be taking an arbitrary position in this matter—not in the least—because I feel that the Senators, speaking generally, are as much interested in this proposition as I am. I think we all concur in feeling that it is a piece of constructive legislation that is going to be of unusual benefit to the business public, and if the Senators have serious objection to my motion as indicated here I do not know but that I will withdraw that motion.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that I am not a member of this committee and I have not had time to give the matter careful study, but from a hurried reading of the amendment as proposed by the House I want to say to the Senator that I have serious objection to it. I can not see where this would benefit the shipper at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will carefully study the whole bill, while I think I would agree with him as to his exception to this particular section, I think he will agree with me that, taken as a whole, it is a very great improvement over the present state of the law.

Mr. President, under the circumstances I think I will withdraw the motion to concur in the House amendments. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments and request a conference with the House and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. POMERENE, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. CUMMINS conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Philippine bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, has the Senator reason to believe that the consideration of this conference report can be concluded during the morning hour? [A pause.] Very well, Mr. President; after a conference with the Senator, I shall not oppose the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

COMMITTEES OF CONGRESS—REPLY TO MR. HUGHES.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, personally I believe that, as a rule, it is neither within the proprieties nor for the best interests of the country for us to indulge in partisan discussions on this floor of pending political contests.

We can not hope to convert each other, and I am afraid that the partisan heat engendered by these discussions and the personal feeling aroused by them sometimes seriously interferes with the conduct of the business of this body and with the interests of the whole country without materially promoting the real interests of any political party. For it must be remembered that on all legislative questions we ought, and on most of these questions we do, put the interests of our country above the apparent and momentary demands of any political party. Therefore, as a rule, I greatly deprecate the injection of bitter partisan debate into the proceedings of this body. Such a discussion does not decide or even materially influence the result of any election; but it does detract, and detract seriously, from both the usefulness and dignity of this body.

It must be conceded, however, that there are rare occasions that constitute the exceptions to this rule, occasions on which a Senator's duty either to the country as a whole or his immediate constituency seems to require that notice be taken here of some current political event or utterance.

It is my belief that a recent utterance of the Republican nominee for President presents such an occasion and justifies the remarks that I am about to make, although I should hesitate very much to undertake to respond here to any ordinary political utterance of that candidate. If we may believe the press reports of Sunday, August 13, 1916, it appears that Mr. Hughes, speaking at Butte, Mont., on August 12, 1916, charged the Democratic Party with sectionalism and read a list of chairmen of the important committees of the National Senate and House to illustrate, as he claimed, that the Government of the United States, and especially all "pork" legislation, as he termed it, is in the control of the Southern States. Let me read briefly from the report of his speech:

The candidate explained the system of committee work in Congress, dwelling upon the influence of the chairmen.

He then read the names of the House committee chairmen from Southern States, and added:

"All estimable gentlemen. I have no personal criticism to make of the honor and respectability and agreeable character of these gentlemen, but I say that an administration under which too many of the committees of the House of Representatives are represented in one section in that manner is a sectional administration. It is not an American administration in the broad and proper sense given to that word."

Hughes further observed that the chairmen of the two important committees in the Senate and House who pass upon the pork legislation are also Democrats from the South—Senator CLARKE, of Arkansas, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and Representative SPARKMAN, of Florida, chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. And finally he pointed out that two more southern Democrats, Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, and Representative KITCHIN, of the same State, respectively, chairmen of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, dominate the bodies which pass upon practically all the appropriations made by Congress.

If Mr. Hughes is acquainted with the work of constituting the committees of Congress, and he surely should be since he undertakes to instruct the American people about it, he must know that both the chairmanship and membership of the various committees of both Houses of Congress are not constituted along any sectional lines or for any sectional reasons whatsoever, but that, on the contrary, the rule governing these matters is the seniority rule which obtains in both political parties and which is based on the experience acquired by Members of both Houses of Congress during the period of their service here. All gentlemen who have had experience in either House of Congress are fully acquainted with the fact that no other general rule for the control of this matter can be devised or applied that is so just to the membership of both Houses and so productive of good results in the work of Congress. The best proof of that fact is that all political parties, including the party represented by Mr. Hughes, have adopted and enforced it. If southern Senators and southern Representatives have received many responsible committee assignments under this rule, it is simply and solely because of their long service here, representing constituencies that are consistently and continuously loyal to the Democratic Party, and not because of their residence in any particular section of our country.

If I were disposed to retort in kind to the Republican candidate for President, I might suggest that the Democratic Party is the only real national party in this Republic, having, as it does, representatives in the two Houses of Congress from every section and from almost every State. I might suggest that even a casual examination of the minority representation on the committees would disclose an even more sectional situation than that to which he alludes. For instance, if the Republicans came into power in this body not a single chairmanship of any importance would be held by the South, although it constitutes a large part of the country in population and in wealth and in area. I might retort that if the Republicans should come into power in this body on March 4 next, two of the most important committees of the Senate, namely, Appropriations and the Judiciary, would be headed by two Senators from a single Western State, so small in wealth and population, in comparison with the greater States of this Republic, as to suggest a "pocket borough," and yet I will not descend to that level, because I know full well that if, by the fortunes of war, our Republican friends should unfortunately control this body after March 4 next, that the two distinguished Senators from Wyoming who would succeed to the chairmanships to which I have alluded would not be chosen for those places because of the fact that they represent a small Western State, but because of their long experience and distinguished service in this body. Why the Republican candidate can not be equally candid and equally fair is beyond my comprehension. His failure to do so can be accounted for on one hypothesis alone; he believes that in certain sections of our country he can stir up passion and prejudice by waving the bloody shirt once more and by crying aloud, "The South is in the saddle."

Mr. President, I had thought that the day for this sort of performance, North or South, had passed forever. I know that there was an unfortunate period in the history of our country when the fires of sectional hate burned high and when appeals of that kind were often made and too often controlled the elections, but it had seemed to me that we have at last gotten away from that bitter period and that once more we had a reunited country and a homogeneous people, and that the man who would undertake, in the North or in the South, to relight the smoldering embers of sectional prejudice was not only not a broad-minded American patriot but was an enemy to his country and a foe to its truest interests.

I recall that when the Spanish-American War made its appeal to the patriotism of the country the response came with equal promptness and equal volume from the North, the East, the West, and the South; that in that war the sons of the men who wore the gray in the sixties marched side by side and shoulder to shoulder with the sons of the men who wore the blue, and that the first life offered up in that struggle was the life of a gallant young North Carolina boy. I recall the occasion when the great McKinley, speaking at the close of that war to the legislature of my own State, of which I was then a member, proclaimed the death of sectionalism, the rebirth of a nation, and declared that proud achievements of American valor on both sides of the great civil conflict were the common property of all the American people, and that the time had come in the providence of the Almighty when the Federal Government should assist in the preservation of the graves of Confederate soldiers. I recall that while our people did not fully accept this generous offer, although it was very deeply appreciated, it was only because they felt that in their own land their own loving care would be all sufficient, and I recall that about four years ago a distinguished Senator from the North [Mr. POMERENE of Ohio] proposed and had adopted an amendment to one of the appropriation bills by which the Federal Government undertook to care for the graves of Confederate soldiers who had died in prison at Johnson Island, Ohio.

I recall the many patriotic utterances of both Presidents Roosevelt and Taft on this great question, and I recall the eloquent appeals of our greatest statesmen and truest patriots, both North and South, for the reestablishment of the Union in love and for the eternal abandonment of sectional prejudice and hatred.

Ah, Mr. President, when I recall all of these things, and when I recall the proud-spirited, high-strung, long-suffering people of my own section, anxious to feel that they are in fact at peace forevermore with their brethren and that they are, indeed, welcome back in the house that their fathers built, and when I recall the brave, just, and generous people of every State in the North and West who have extended the olive branch in good faith and who do not approve of these attempts to revive and rekindle sectional hatred, then I can not help but feel that any party that would teach the American people to hate each other is not fit to serve the American people and is not worthy to be trusted by the American people, and I can not help but feel that any presidential candidate who, in his eager hunt for votes, would stoop to appeal to passions and prejudices of this sort is not big enough or brave or broad enough in heart or in mind to be a worthy President of the whole country and of a reunited people.

THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the conference report now before the Senate involves only four amendments to the Senate bill. The first amendment is practically nothing at all, because it merely strikes out one paragraph and inserts an identical paragraph, a proceeding which was due to the parliamentary situation in the House.

The second amendment is the enlarged amendment which is proposed by the House. The Senate conferees agreed to it with certain amendments, those amendments being provisions which were inserted in the bill by the committee report and agreed to by the Senate.

The third amendment proposed by the House strikes out the so-called Clarke amendment which the Senate inserted in the bill. This amendment was not only stricken out by the House conferees, but it was fortified by a vote of the House instructing the conferees not to consider any proposal such as was involved in the Clarke amendment. This instruction by the House raised a very serious doubt whether the Senate could with proper dignity enter into a conference with the House conferees, limited by such stringent instructions. Finally, however, after consultation on this side with those who were strong proponents of the Clarke amendment, it was considered advisable to yield to the House in this matter and to enter into a conference, conceding that the Clarke amendment should be eliminated.

The fourth amendment covers the preamble to the bill. The Senate conferees agreed to accept the House preamble to the bill in place of the preamble adopted by the Senate. There is not much difference in the preambles. The difference is largely a matter of phraseology. Each preamble holds out to the people of the Philippine Islands the idea of ultimate independence.

Mr. President, I have stated that amendment No. 2 was accepted by the conferees with certain amendments. Amendment No. 2 covers practically 33 sections of the bill. The amendments which the Senate conferees insisted on and which were ingrafted upon the House amendment make the following changes in the House amendment.

As presented by the House the electorate in the Philippine Islands was to be considerably enlarged, and this enlargement was to take place at the first election as well as at all others. The Senate conferees insisted that the electorate should not be enlarged at the first election, that the first election to be held should take place with the same electorate, with the same qualifications for election as those which had prevailed heretofore, and this the House conferees accepted.

As presented by the House, amendment numbered 2 did not permit American residents in the islands to be voters. The Senate conferees felt that Americans resident in the islands should be voters, and the House conferees yielded on that proposition. They are recognized voters not only at the first election, but at subsequent elections.

As presented by the House, amendment numbered 2 did not provide for the selection of a vice governor. The Senate conferees insisted that there should be appointed by the President an American who should have the position of vice governor of the islands, ready to take the place instantly of the Governor upon his disability or death.

The Senate conferees also insisted that this vice governor should be intrusted with certain important duties: First, the control of the educational system of the islands; second, the control of the sanitation of the islands, thus insisting that the bodily and mental health of the people of the islands should remain for the present under the control of an American appointed by the President. This was conceded by the House conferees.

The House conferees also conceded another amendment which the Senate incorporated in the bill, and that was that an auditor for the islands for the Philippine government, for the provincial governments, and for the municipal governments should be appointed by the President of the United States; that he should have an assistant auditor; and that all the accounts of the Philippine government and its officials, the accounts of the municipal governments and of the provincial governments should pass through the hands of this auditor. This is for the purpose of insuring in the future what has been true of the past, a protection against the possibility of graft or the misappropriation of funds in the islands.

Mr. President, those are the amendments which the Senate conferees insisted on and which the House conferees accepted.

I may say, in conclusion, Mr. President, that there is very little difference between the bill now reported by the conference committee and the bill as originally presented to the Senate by the Committee on the Philippines. The chief change which has been made in the bill as passed by the Senate is the elimination of the Clarke amendment and the elimination of the prohibition amendment, both of which were ingrafted upon the bill in the Senate and both of which have been the subjects of such high controversy that there seemed no possibility of enacting legislation for the Philippine Islands at this session unless they could be eliminated.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator be kind enough to state the difference between the preamble as it was presented and the one agreed upon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will be glad to do so. The Senate preamble read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines such an increasing control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the sovereignty of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence, which it is the purpose of the United States to grant when, in the judgment of the United States, it will be to the permanent interest of the people of the Philippine Islands: Therefore—

The House preamble reads as follows:

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc.—

So, Mr. President, the two preambles are alike in this respect. They hold out to the people of the Philippine Islands the legislative assurance, the presidential assurance, the governmental assurance of the United States that it is the ultimate purpose of the Government of the United States to give independence to the Philippines when the proper time arrives.

Mr. LANE. The Senator says the preamble holds out hope of liberty and self-government to the Philippine people. It sort of dangles it before their eyes and then grabs it back before they can get hold of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish the Senator would state the change in the preamble.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senate conferees accepted the House preamble, which practically declares that the Philippines shall be given their independence when they have established a stable government, whereas the Senate preamble declared they were to have their independence when, in the opinion of the United States, it was to their interest to have it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Really there is no difference between the two.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not an important difference.

Mr. President, let me say in conclusion that this is a bill not for the purpose of legislating for the Philippine people but it is a bill to confer upon the Philippine people a larger power to govern themselves. It changes the form of government slightly. Whereas at the present time the legislative power of the Philippine Islands is vested in a commission appointed by the President and in an assembly elected by the people, the bill now before Congress proposes to vest the legislative power in a legislature composed of a lower house, called the house of representatives, elected by the people, and an upper house, composed of senators, also elected by the people. This legislative body will also have two senators, appointed by the governor, to represent the non-Christian tribes and nine members of the lower house, also appointed by the governor, to represent the non-Christian tribes. So with the two senators and nine representatives selected by the governor and 81 representatives and 24 senators elected by the people the Philippine Islands will have a legislature empowered to pass practically all laws for the control of the islands, with such exceptions as are placed in this bill as a limitation.

Mr. President, I think those exceptions are pretty well understood. The Philippine Legislature can not pass laws on the subject of coinage or immigration without the approval of the President of the United States. It can not pass certain laws with relation to the public domain without the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think there will be any real self-government given the Philippines under this bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, yes; I have no doubt of it. They have the power——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the Senator understand that their rights are so restricted, so circumscribed, that really it is a mere plaything or make-believe which has been accorded the Filipinos; that they are given no substantial right of self-government?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At the present time the Philippine Legislature is exercising large governmental power. Only the other day there was received here in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Philippines the laws passed at the last session of the Philippine Legislature. A certified copy of those laws was sent here for the information of Congress, in order that Congress may exercise the power to repeal them or restrict them if it should disapprove them. But, as a matter of fact, Congress has never exercised that restrictive power, and every act of the Philippine Legislature has gone into force and is a law in the Philippines.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is true for the reason that the Filipinos under the direction of American citizens resident on the islands, and under the advice and tutelage of Americans, and awed by interests of the American philanthropists who have gone over there and taken the islands by the throat, would not send a measure here that they did not know Congress would approve.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Mississippi is misled in that. The restrictions upon the legislative powers of the Philippine Legislature in the past have been considerable, because of the fact that the President has the power to appoint the upper house. But under this legislation, upon which the Senate and the House have now practically reached an agreement, both houses will be composed of Filipinos elected by the people. They have power to pass all laws with relation to taxation; they have power to pass all laws with relation to appropriations; they have power to pass all laws concerning the right of property with a few exceptions, which are ingrafted in the bill, just as Congress and our State legislatures are restrained by certain constitutional limitations.

But while this act is virtually a constitution for the Philippine Islands and places a legitimate limit upon the power of the legislature, it leaves to the Philippine Legislature virtually the power of local government. It gives to the Philippine senate the power to confirm appointments made by the Governor General. It gives to the Philippine Legislature the power to say how high taxes shall be. It gives to the Philippine Legislature the power to say for what appropriations shall be. It gives to the Philippine Legislature the control over the municipalities of the islands, the cities, and the towns. It gives to the Philippine Legislature, with the approval of the President, the disposition of the public domain. It gives to the Philippine Legislature, in short, all of the legitimate power of local self-government and self-taxation, and it is in my opinion a measure wisely planned and carefully planned to increase beyond the point that has heretofore existed these powers of local self-government.

Mr. President, I am willing to make the prediction that under this act there will be a natural and healthy expansion of self-government in the Philippine Islands, that under this act the Philippine people will show themselves capable of self-government, and that it will not be many years before the people of the United States will be willing at least to give fuller and perhaps complete self-government to the Philippine Islands if her people shall desire it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska one question about the conference report. I notice in the report agreed upon that the first election under this act is to be held early in October.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is.

Mr. JONES. Why did not the committee place that date a little bit later, so that it would give a little more time? The Senator from Nebraska will realize that it takes from 35 to 40 days to get mail from this country to the Philippines. Of course, I suppose we could cable the terms of this act, but it seems to me that an officially certified act ought to be there before they take steps to hold the election.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The question of the Senator from Washington is a very natural one, I realize, and the explanation is this: This act has been framed in most of its details for many months. Copies of it are in the Philippine Islands and the changes have been cabled over there. Preparation has been made for the election, and, as a matter of fact, the election of the lower house actually occurred in June last. This act and the amendment agreed upon in committee provide that the lower house elected in June shall be the first house of the Philippine Legislature.

Mr. JONES. I had not seen that provision.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that there is nothing but the Philippine senate to elect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Washington that Gen. McIntyre, of the War Department, wired to Gov. Gen. Harrison to ascertain whether the date named, the first Tuesday of October, would be satisfactory; and day before yesterday Gov. Gen. Harrison wired that it would be.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that it gives a very short time to get the notice into those islands, which are great in number, with reference to the election; but I make no objection to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska be kind enough to yield to a question which I desire to ask in order to get some information?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator say what disposition has been made as to the salaries of the supreme court judges of the Philippines?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have been placed at $8,000 for the chief justice and at $7,500 for each of the associate justices.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does that provision take effect immediately?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can not help but think that is a very important result. A reduction of the salaries of the judges of the supreme court from $10,000 to $7,500 may seem very unimportant to us here, but it is an exceedingly important thing as affecting the American section of the judiciary in the islands. I have yet to learn of any demand for the reduction of those salaries, either from the Filipinos or from anyone in our own Government here. It seems to have been done, so far as I can understand, offhand, and perhaps as a drastic illustration of economy at somebody else's expense for the benefit, perhaps, of people who live seven or eight thousand miles away.

If my recollection is correct, Mr. President, the question of the salaries of the judges of the supreme court in the Philippines was very thoroughly gone into by a committee of the House of Representatives several years ago when the first Philippine act was passed or, perhaps, when it was being revised. At that time, if my recollection is correct, the salary was fixed at $7,500. The American judges then serving in the Philippines made out a most clear case, as I remember, before the committee, either by correspondence or in person, to the effect that they could not live in the islands on that salary, and, if my recollection is also correct, one of them felt himself forced to come home. As a result of that investigation Congress placed the salary at $10,000 a year, and it has been at that rate ever since. Now, I understand this bill arbitrarily reduces the salary, to take effect immediately, affecting the sitting judges, to $7,500, which Congress some years ago agreed was an impossible salary upon which a United States judge could live in those islands with a dignity befitting his position.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is probably acquainted with the salaries paid to the judges in Porto Rico, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in such Territorial possessions of the United States, and I am sure he will be willing to concede that the salaries of the judges in the Philippine Islands should not be any greater. There is an appeal from the court in the Philippine Islands to the Supreme Court of the United States, and experience with judges who are sent out to such posts is, I think, that the fact that the salary of $10,000 is paid, instead of seven or eight thousand dollars, does not always result in getting better judges. I have no desire to disparage the ability or character of the men upon the bench in the Philippine Islands, but I am advised that it would be possible to replace them with equal talent at $7,500 a year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the judge of the Federal court in Porto Rico gets $5,000, and that the judges of the Federal court in Hawaii get $6,000 each a year.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that these salaries have never been fixed, except by the Commission of the Philippine Islands. The organic act of the government of those islands made this provision:

> And the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court shall hereafter be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive the compensation heretofore prescribed by the commission until otherwise provided by Congress.

Congress has never otherwise provided. I was in favor, when the suggestion was made, to propose a provision to the bill which would not affect the salaries of the judges who were there, but the House conferees would not consent. In reading this act and finding that those judges have no definite term, finding that the appointment is revocable at will by the President of the United States, it seemed to me that Congress intended that there should be some time when the salaries should be fixed and definite. If it were a term of four, six, or even ten years, I would say their salaries should not be diminished or increased during their term; but where men have been appointed under a provision that Congress shall fix the salary, and where this is the first time we have had an opportunity to fix it, it seems to me that it is not such a great hardship to do so.

Besides, I do not believe that the cost of living in the Philippines is any greater than is the cost in the United States. Servant hire is a great deal less. Not only that, but the houses in which the judges live, being open houses, not houses with stone or concrete walls, not fine structures, must of necessity be cheaper. That must affect the price paid for rent by persons who rent houses in which to live. It seems to me, all things considered, that, while I should like to put in such a provision preserving their salaries for their terms, the House conferees would not consent to it.

In addition to that, in view of the provision of the law I have read, their term of office not being definite, and the President being able to call for the resignation of any one of the judges to-morrow, when his term would be ended, this is not similar to an instance where a judge is selected for a definite term, and so has a right to rely upon that definite term and upon the salary affixed thereto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should feel very much more at ease in the matter if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] could give the Senate assurance that it was more than possible for us to secure as good judges for the lower salary as we are now securing for the $10,000 salary. What I should like to hear would be an assurance that we were certain to get as good judges under the new rating as we have secured under the old rating.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] says the cost of living is not so high, or is not any higher, in the Philippines than it is, perhaps, in Hawaii or in Porto Rico. All of my information is to the contrary. The Senator makes reference to the apparently low wages and salaries to servants; but, in reply to that, I desire to say that it is well to remember that it takes a great many more servants there to do the same amount of work.

Mr. President, it has always been impressed upon my mind in dealing with this great Philippine problem that the most sacred thing of all in this connection is the judicial branch of that government. It is certainly incumbent upon us to be absolutely certain that the judiciary of the Philippine Islands shall be what American ideals desire in that respect.

The separation of the functions of government into judicial, legislative, and executive branches is in a sense brand new to those people—at least, they have only become familiar with such a system within a very few years—and the most difficult thing to drive into the minds of people who are learning a new form of government is the sacredness of the judiciary. If we are going to enact in this bill any provision which will lower the character or the ability of the American section of the judiciary in the Philippines we shall be doing an evil thing.

My information is to the effect that a judge in the Philippine Islands who desires to live in accordance with the dignity which should accompany his office, and who is entitled to compensation fitting the ability which he brings to the discharge of his duties, can not do so on $7,500 a year. From more than one source I have heard that $10,000 a year is not any too much.

The Senator from Colorado called attention to the organic act, which specifically says that the salaries of those judges shall remain at the figure fixed heretofore by the commission, unless Congress otherwise determines at some later date. That, of course, is implied in any act of Congress, but it was the idea, perhaps, of Congress to fix those salaries at $10,000 a year, and that action was done after investigation, full and complete, of the facts. So far as I have been able to learn, there has been no change in the conditions in the Philippine Islands which would warrant this severe reduction. It is now proposed to take one dollar out of every four given by way of salary to those judges.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I will say that there has been no change, except that the price of labor has doubled in the Philippines since the time when that act was passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I have understood that the cost of living has been going up steadily.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from New York, in corroboration of his statement, that there have been frequent instances of judges in the islands resigning?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that is true.

Mr. WEEKS. They have been very much more frequent than in the case of other officers in those islands.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it has become increasingly difficult to persuade American judges to remain in the Philippines during their indefinite term of office, to which the Senator from Colorado has referred; and if we are going to have constant changes in the personnel of the American section of the bench out there, it will be an evil and a sad thing for the judiciary as a whole in those islands. To my mind it is a legislative offense to treat an officer as this bill treats the judges of the Philippine Supreme Court, reducing their salaries while they are in the service without giving them any chance to readjust their affairs, and, in a sense, breaking faith with them, in view of the terms of their original appointment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator from New York or anyone else who is connected with this legislation familiar——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not connected with this legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Is anyone connected with this legislation familiar with the character, standing, and reputation of the lawyers who have departed from this country to serve as judges in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I happen to know something of a couple, and they are exceptionally able men.

Mr. BORAH. Are they still in the service in the islands?

Mr. WADSWORTH. One is, as I happen to know.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I ask that question in good faith, because I am not familiar with the attorneys who have taken positions on the bench in the Philippines; but I am familiar with the result of the administration of the judiciary in some of our other possessions, and $7,500 a year is altogether too much for such men. There may be an exception in the Philippines, and, if so, it will make altogether a different proposition in my mind; but in Alaska and in others of our territorial possessions, the men to whom we have given judicial authority, certainly with very few exceptions—there are exceptions, but they are rare—have been utterly unfit to discharge judicial duties.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am bound to say that I have heard similar complaints as those voiced by the Senator from Idaho with respect to the judges in some of our territorial possessions, but I have never heard that complaint directed against the judges we have sent to the Philippines.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the chairman of the committee for just a moment, as I desire to ask him a question? I inquire of the Senator what became of the amendment inserted in the bill in the Senate and found on page 5 of the old bill, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the islands?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator was not in his seat when I explained the matter to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I was not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The House amended the bill in rather a peculiar way. It struck out 33 of the sections of the bill and specifically rejected the thirty-fourth section, so that the Senate conferees were confronted by what was nominally an amendment, but was practically a complete bill in itself, consisting of 33 sections. We also found that the conferees on the part of the House were bound by instructions not to even consider one of the amendments which had been ingrafted upon the bill in the Senate, commonly known as the Clarke amendment, and that by adopting the 33 sections as a single amendment they had wiped out all of the Senate provisions in the bill.

The Senate conferees found themselves under the necessity of accepting the House amendment, which was practically a substitute for the Senate bill, embracing 33 sections, and we were only able, after several conferences with the House conferees, to induce them to accept four or five of the important amendments which I have already recited, and which go to vital matters, affecting the perpetuation of good government in the islands. One of those amendments related to the vice governor, another to the auditor, another to the electorate. Those were vital amendments which we were able to induce the House conferees to accept.

The prohibition amendment of which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is the author, and which the Senate ingrafted upon the bill as reported by the Senate committee, was a matter of legislation, whereas this bill is not a matter of legislation; but it is a constitution for the Philippine Islands under which they can legislate for themselves. Under this bill, if they desire prohibition, they can enact it. Our bill is designed to give them self-government, with certain constitutional restrictions.

Mr. GRONNA. Does not the Senator from Nebraska believe that it would be possible to incorporate a provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in a constitution dealing with a class of people such as reside in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it might be possible if we were dealing with the people of the Philippine Islands, but we are dealing with the House of Representatives, and we found that the conferees on the part of the House had certain very definite opinions. In addition to that the Democratic convention, which recently assembled and adopted a platform, incorporated a plank in that platform indorsing the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, is it not a fact that the Senate yielded on all important points, except as to certain administrative features of the bill, and that the bill is now practically the bill as passed by the House?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, while it is largely the bill as it came from the House, it is also practically the bill as reported by the Senate committee, except that it has ingrafted upon it the House preamble. It is true the Senate conferees yielded on two important amendments, and on two only—the Clarke amendment and the amendment of which the Senator from North Dakota is the author. It is necessary, however, in order to bring about a conference agreement to yield; it is not possible for one side to secure everything; and in this case the committee was convinced that the House of Representatives was behind the House conferees on both these amendments.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator, of course, remembers that the Senate by a very decisive vote—35 to 23, as I recall—voted to insert the prohibition provision in the bill.

I also desire to ask the Senator another question. I find in section 15, paragraph (c), relating to the qualifications of the voters, this provision:

Those who are able to read and write either Spanish, English, or a native language.

Now, I am not familiar with the old law. Is the last part of that language in the old law?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is not, Mr. President. This bill as it passed the Senate, as well as the bill as it passed the House, made a considerable enlargement of the electorate in the Philippine Islands, and in that respect the two Houses are in accord; but this enlargement does not take place in the first election, and the next election will not be held for three years.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I have a right to ask the Senator having the bill in charge why it was necessary at this time to extend this privilege to the people of the islands. I had understood all the time that the Filipino people were advancing; that they were progressing; and yet the committee of conference, having the ultimate say on this bill, inserts a provision which I believe is very important, and which, to my mind, shows that those people have not been progressing at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that the reason why the Senate adopted the provision that the electorate should remain the same as now at the first election was to a large extent because they have not time to enlarge the franchise and have a registration and comply with the requirements that should be made.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator from Colorado believe that those people will be more ignorant at the next election than they are now, so that it is important that we should allow them to have a seat in the legislative body when they can speak neither Spanish nor English, but speak only their own language, of which I understand there are very many in those islands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, Mr. President, the Houses are not in discord upon the qualification of voters. Each one of the Houses has adopted a proposition to the effect of allowing those who can read and write the English, Spanish, or native language to vote, and the only limitation that the Senate put upon it was in regard to the first election. The first election was limited to the present electorate.

I will state the reason why I thought at the time that the franchise should be enlarged. It was because I believe that as we progress it has a tendency to make people seek education; and inasmuch as we have been enlarging it considerably, it seems to me that we ought to adopt more liberal terms for them.

A great many people believe that no restrictions whatever should be put upon a voter; that if he is governed, he should have the right to say something in the government. That, to a certain extent, entered into our deliberations; but there is no discord between the two Houses in that respect, and we could not change that because the action of both Houses was the same.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Colorado knows very well that there are very many languages spoken by people even in this country. Does the Senator from Colorado believe that we should allow, when a test is required as to the person's fitness for citizenship, any other language to be spoken here except the one we are using now—the English language?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, yes, Mr. President. I think it would be an outrage to take possession of a group of islands and not let the people of the islands who speak the language commonly used there vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I have reference to the proceedings of the legislative body.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As to the legislative body, what is required there is either the Spanish or the English language.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; or some other native language.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think not—not in the legislature.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is reading the qualifications for electors.

Mr. GRONNA. I am reading the qualifications of the voters of the islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but not the qualifications of members of the legislature.

Mr. GRONNA. The old law provides, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, that to be qualified to vote they must be able to speak and read either the English or the Spanish language. This bill enlarges that and permits those people to vote if they can speak English, Spanish, or some other language.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator is in error. The House bill is exactly the same as the Senate bill in that respect. The conference committee could not touch that matter, because the bill as passed by the Senate made the electorate of the same character. The Senator is evidently laboring under the delusion that the proceedings of the legislature will be in some other language.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I am not, Mr. President.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me, I think the Senator from Nebraska must be in error in saying that the conferees could not undertake to consider the question of the electorate, because they have already made a change in the electorate; and the two Houses, as I recollect, were not in harmony on that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Rhode Island is in error there. The change which the conferees made was because there was the difference that the House bill did not permit Americans to vote, and we were therefore at liberty——

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Nebraska will remember that in section 16 of the bill as it passed the Senate there was a clause, "(d)," which provided that in addition to the qualifications for electors prescribed in the conference report "those to whom the privilege of suffrage may be granted by the Philippine Legislature" should also be permitted to vote. That was eliminated. So it is evident that there were changes made in the electorate. I am only speaking of the technicality of the provision.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator from North Dakota is complaining that the House conferees are permitting men to vote who speak and write and read only the Philippine dialect. We could not alter that, because the Senate and the House were in accord in permitting such men to vote.

Mr. GRONNA. I asked for an explanation from the chairman. Perhaps I did not make myself plain; but I was curious to know why it was important to extend the franchise, the right to vote, to the Filipino people whether they could speak the English or the Spanish language or not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, here is the provision to which the Senator should refer in speaking of the legislature:

SEC. 13. That the members of the Senate of the Philippines, except as herein provided, shall be elected for terms of six and three years, as hereinafter provided, by the qualified electors of the Philippines. Each of the senatorial districts defined as hereinafter provided shall have the right to elect two senators. No person shall be an elective member of the Senate of the Philippines who is not a qualified elector and over 30 years of age, and who is not able to read and write either the Spanish or English language.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the section which prescribes the qualifications of members of the senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And of the house also.

Mr. GRONNA. It is not the one which prescribes the qualifications of an elector.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; in the case of the elector it is his native language, English or Spanish, that is required.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Either English or Spanish or the native language. It seems to me it would be an outrage to deprive people who have lived over there all their lives, and who can not speak the English or the Spanish language, of the right to vote unless they can speak a foreign language. If this country should be taken possession of by some foreign Government, they might as well say: "Well, we do not want the English language used. We will not let you speak your native language; but if you can speak Spanish or German you can vote." It would be a great hardship, and it would be a great wrong.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Colorado nor with the Senator from Nebraska. It simply goes to show that the Filipino people are absolutely incapable of self-government; that they have not progressed; that they have not advanced.

I listened to the speech of the very able Senator from Colorado telling the Senate of the progress these people had made. If they have made such progress why is it necessary to say in this Constitution, as is suggested by the chairman of the committee, that the Filipino people shall be given the right to vote whether they know how to speak or read the English language or the Spanish language or not? They may speak any of the hundreds of different dialects which are being used in the islands.

Mr. President, I had hoped, when the Senate voted 35 to 23 for the provision which I offered to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the islands, that that matter would be given some attention. It is clear to me that the members of this conference committee are opposed to prohibition. It is clear to me that if they had been in sympathy with this great vital moral issue they would not have permitted that amendment to be stricken out, but would have insisted that it should remain in the bill.

Mr. President, this is not a party measure. I want to call attention to what the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] said during the debate:

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that the plan of government which the United States is now proposing to give to the Filipino, believing that it will probably be the prototype by which the Filipino will shape his own government when he becomes independent, ought to contain everything that the American Congress thinks will be for the best interests of the Filipino; and, while the Filipino Legislature have the right to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Philippine Islands, I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that it would be wise for the American Congress to start them out without this handicap of the saloon.

I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota will be adopted, because the liquor traffic is a handicap, and the people of the Philippines, who are struggling to establish a government, are entitled to this assistance. The Senator's amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. President, the amendment was adopted, as I have said, by a vote of 35 to 23. I had hoped that the chairman of this committee would insist upon the retention of this amendment. I understood during this debate, and I gathered from what he said, that if an amendment were adopted providing that the Filipino people should be allowed to use their own so-called native drinks there would be no opposition to it from the Filipino people or from the representatives from the Philippine Islands. I have myself talked to the representatives from the Philippine Islands, and they have said to me that they have no objection to the provision in the amended form, and I want to take the opportunity to read the amendment, so as to get it before the Senate:

That no intoxicating drink or drug shall be manufactured for sale or gift, imported for sale or gift, or sold or offered for sale or gift for use as a beverage, but this shall not apply to or include the native wines and beverages commonly known as vina, tuba, basi, and tapuy.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to my amendment was carried only by one or two majority, it is true—I think it was carried by 2 votes—but the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to my amendment was inserted in the bill, and I had hoped that the conferees on the part of the Senate would insist that this amendment should remain in the bill.

The Senator from Colorado, in speaking upon this bill and upon the amendment, told the Senate that it was largely a question of revenue. Mr. President, I am prepared to show that so far as revenue is concerned the saloon is not a revenue producer to the Philippine Islands. It is not a revenue producer to any State. I can take as proof of that my own State, where there has been no saloon since we became a State, and I believe that we have made as great and as rapid progress as has been made in any State.

Mr. President, I am sorry indeed to know that the conferees on the part of the Senate were willing to see this important provision stricken out of the bill. As the chairman of the committee has said, this is a constitution for the Filipino people. When we adopted the constitution for the people of the State of North Dakota we inserted a provision in that constitution, the twentieth article of that constitution, which provides that no liquor shall be manufactured or sold within the borders of that State. It would not have been more difficult for the conferees to let this provision remain in the bill. When we study the characteristics and the habits of those people over in the Philippine Islands we realize that this very provision is one that would have been of greater benefit to them than any other provision contained in the bill.

Only a few years ago, Mr. President, I went to the western country, when I was a mere boy. I went to what they called then the "Great American Desert." That same place to-day is known as the "bread basket of the world"; and it has been made such not from the revenues of any saloon but because there has been no saloon there for 30 years. This great progress has been made because we have within that State a sober, loyal, and patriotic people.

Mr. President, one of the representatives of the Philippine Islands said to me that if it were not for the fact that they needed the revenue—he agreed with me that this was a great moral question and that the amendment ought to remain in the bill. There is not a Senator on this floor who can show that the revenue derived from the liquor traffic will be of any substantial benefit to the people of the islands. Take my State, for instance—a new State—inhabited by people who came there without wealth. Every dollar we have in our possession has been taken out of the soil. What are the conditions to-day? I would not speak of this were it not for the fact that I want to meet the argument of those who say that the liquor traffic is a revenue producer.

As the morning hour is about to expire, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate some tables in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

MANY REASONS FOR NORTH DAKOTA'S WIDESPREAD PROSPERITY SET FORTH.

He is always gathering startling statistics setting forth the greatness and prosperity of the State and then setting them forth in pointed paragraphs, easily grasped and positive in proof. He has recently issued a new map of North Dakota which shows the immense coal deposits of the western part of the State, and also indicates all the railroad lines with proposed extensions.

On the back of the map is a wealth of information which every good citizen of the State should learn by heart so as to be able to give to strangers and all who might inquire the splendid facts about our resources, our development, and our great wealth and future.

Among the many interesting items of information Mr. Flint furnishes are the following:

Crop production in North Dakota this year aggregates in quantity about 58 per cent more than last year. Prices on December 1 average 10 per cent lower than a year ago, making total value of crop production, on this basis, about 42 per cent more than last year.

For the United States, production this year aggregates in quantity about 9 per cent more than last year. Prices December 1 average 1 per cent lower than a year ago, making a total value of crop production on this basis about 8 per cent more than last year; these estimates are based upon crops whose value in the last complete crop census represented 85 per cent of the value of all crops grown, and may be regarded as representative of all crops.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 15455, the shipping bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the chairman of the committee if he will not allow the bill to be temporarily laid aside for the conclusion of the Philippine conference report?

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is not going to take a long time, I am willing to yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it can be finished in a reasonable time.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I think it will take some little time. I know other Senators who want to speak on this question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing to expedite public business in any way I can. I am very anxious to conclude the shipping bill as early as possible, but I am willing to lay it aside, subject, of course, to my right to call it up at any time if the conference report seems to take too long. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall have to object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

Monday August 14, 1916.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I promise the Chair that under no conditions will I occupy the floor so long as the last time I indulged in some comments on the shipping bill. I have no purpose merely to consume time, Mr. President. All I desire is to place in the RECORD such objections as I have to the consideration of this measure and its passage. In due time it will reach a roll call. I understand that conference action has been had by the majority party which justifies a reasonable hope that a sufficient number of votes will be forthcoming for its enactment.

I forbear to speak of the gentlemen who attended the Democratic conference as being members of a caucus, because caucuses have been abolished by various agencies, public and private—they have obtained a bad name. Newspapers, magazines, university professors, many who are denominated under the collective term of high-brows have universally agreed that a caucus is a most iniquitous instrumentality of party procedure.

I do not regard the conference as having bound anyone to act contrary to his own judgment, but if perchance it should happen that any gentleman on the majority side of the Chamber should feel constrained to vote otherwise than for this measure, I have no doubt but that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], will again stand in the aisle of this Chamber and denounce without stint and anathematize without limit the diabolic disloyalty of any Democrat who refuses to abide by the result of the conference, call it what you will. So I am in considerable belief that at last a majority may be mustered to the passage of this measure.

I am not undismayed by the penalties invoked by my eloquent colleague [Mr. LEWIS] a few days since. He took occasion to remark at considerable length upon the Mexican question and the Mexican situation. The substance of it was that all of us who did not agree with the policy of this administration, who did not support the administration by our votes and our conduct here, were guilty of treason.

I do not know in what particular form the punishment shall be meted out to my associates and myself, whether we shall be hanged, drawn, or quartered on this side of the Chamber in the event we do not mend our ways, or whether we will be remitted to the unceasing indignation of our constituents. I do not know which would be the worse. To those who desire to continue to hold office probably the latter, even those who are indifferent will prefer to still walk upon the earth in the flesh.

We will not, as far as we are concerned on this side of the aisle, be moved by the fear of such penalty, either of a Democratic conference or of the unmitigated maledictions of my colleague. I heard his address; it is eloquent, convincing to those who are already convinced, strengthening any doubting brother who may be dallying by the wayside, and it would satisfy even the bloodthirsty cravings of the senior Senator from Missouri. I heard him a number of times since I have had the privilege of staying in my seat inveigh upon those who refused to accept the result of a Democratic conference as party traitors, and asking that they be regarded as fit subjects for various political penalties. I know not what they will possibly be. So far all of them have survived, none have been executed, none have been expelled from the party, for perchance, Mr. President, just at this writing both parties want all the votes they can get. They have been bidding for woman suffrage, in which I cordially join them. I have been a suffragette for a good many years. They have been bidding at the remnant bargain counter for the remains of the old Bull Moose Party. I do not know that I would agree with party authorities to the extent to which the bids have been advanced. I think somebody is liable to obtain a bad bargain, that somebody on the one or the other side of the bargain may at last be obtaining goods under false pretenses. I believe that most of the voters according to their political affiliations have returned to the two old parties with which they were formerly allied without regard to any bid, any platform, any political organization, or otherwise for their support.

I have happily no manuscript. I shall at times refer to several documents which I shall, in their turn, ask leave to place in the RECORD, either with or without my reading—the latter, so far as I can make it possible.

There seems a sort of mania that possesses a portion of the majority, at least, to expend money. For some of the appropriation bills I have voted. My associates on this side of the Chamber have also so voted. On those that relate to the Army and the Navy, the branches of the public defense, such as coast defenses, for necessary Army posts, and other matters of a like kind, there has been no party division. We have voted considerable increases, and a statement of them was inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a few days ago. That statement shows very large increases, not only for military and naval purposes, but for other purposes.

The leader on the floor in the other House stated a week or two ago that the increase of appropriations because of our Mexican trouble equaled $125,000,000. There have been numerous increases for other purposes, civil in character. It will be a long time—probably it will be between the first of September and the middle of September, at least—before Congress will adjourn, when we shall be able to tabulate finally the entire appropriations made by this session of Congress. When that shall have been done it will be found, to say the least, that we have been exceedingly liberal with every department and with every possible purpose for which public expenditures could be made. I shall not take so much time as to go into the details of these various measures or the shipping bill. I do wish, however, to place in the RECORD my protest and express my views upon the tendency of which the shipping bill is but one evidence.

Since the 7th day of April, 1913, a Democratic Congress and this administration have been continually engaged in enlarging the scope of governmental activity. We began with an authorization of a railroad in Alaska; we shall end for this session possibly on a large scale with the pending shipping bill. We began in Alaska with $35,000,000; we will end with the shipping bill with $50,000,000—both of them involving transportation questions. Between these two poles of the beginning and the ending of this tendency lies a great mass of legislation and bills pending, some of them undisposed of, indicating the same general tendency, the same general disease.

For my part, I have stated two or three times on the floor of the Senate, and I will restate, that I never would vote for any undertaking by any governmental authority, local or national, in which private enterprise could as well or better perform the same service or produce for the public use the same commodity. I have yet the same views. If private undertakings can perform the service just as well, let them do so; do not enlarge the Government activities. If you do, you will produce the same commodity or render the same service at a greatly increased cost.

I do not know of a municipality to-day, of which I have a detailed knowledge, whether it be a large one or down to the smallest one, that has complete municipal organization in the country, in which from 25 to 33⅓ per cent could not be saved in the actual operation of the municipality if the same undertakings were conducted by private enterprise. There is necessarily waste in every public undertaking. It arises from various causes. One is that government, local or otherwise, never takes into consideration the human element that always inheres in every governmental operation. I know that very many university professors sit down in the seclusion of their study and tell us on paper how something can be done; how well a public undertaking can plan, can execute, and deliver the commodity or perform the service. I never knew one of them to succeed in actual operation. I never knew an estimate to be made on a public undertaking that was correctly made at the time the first appropriation was given by the legislative authority.

When the Panama Canal was started it was estimated that from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000 would complete it. We had up to the 30th day of June, 1916, expended more than $407,000,000 on that canal and it is not yet completed. There is, it is true, an accident here and there to be considered, which was not foreseen by the engineers who prepared the plans, but, like all other concerns of that kind, we must figure for a reasonable amount of unascertained cost. Nothing can be charged, of course, to these numerous slides which have occurred; but the estimates themselves, taking all of them from the first blue print that was made and the first bill introduced looking to that end, showed a very gross disproportion between the estimated cost and the actual cost up to the 30th day of last June.

This always happens. It happens in every city undertaking. New York City's current expenses annually, her public indebtedness, the current expenses of the city of Chicago, the current expenses of every other city of which I have any knowledge or any acquaintance with their financial affairs shows always, because of the human element in a republican form of government, a loss that is inevitable and which is to be charged always to a governmental undertaking.

I am ready in this Chamber to vote for a subsidy flat and to call it a subsidy. I do not care to disguise it by the name of a mail contract or a subvention or an aid or a fishery bounty, or anything else of that kind. I am willing to call it a flat subsidy, and be done with it, long before I shall ever vote for the building, leasing, or operation of merchant shipping by the Government. I know that for many years, reaching back to the Civil War, the majority party has been against subsidies or aids to the merchant shipping of this country. To that objection I have no criticism to make except as a matter of principle. There is, however, at this time a departure from the essential operative part of the principle itself by the majority party in this Chamber and in the other House.

What is the difference between creating a shipping board, with $50,000,000 capital, of which the Government shall own a majority of the shares, as provided in the bill—shall own of the $50,000,000 of stock at least a majority of the shares—and that the rest shall be open to private subscription, and selling it at last, and a subsidy? Who wants it? Who that knows anything of extensive business operations wants to embark his money in minority holdings in a Government corporation to end after five years? However successful it may be, whatever dividends may be paid, whatever business may be acquired, at the end of the five years the ownership ceases. The shipping board, by the process described in the bill, proceeds at the end of that time to sell all of their property engaged in the shipping business that the Government is operating or to dispose of the reversionary interest on leases or charters, if that has been the method of embarking in the business. So, after it has been made successful, it is to be sold. If it fails it is to be sold. Whatever happens, under the provisions of this bill the undertaking is to be abandoned.

I believe that this is not done inadvertently. In the shipping bill, which was last session pending here, and which was defeated confessedly, so far as I am concerned, by a filibuster in the spring of 1915, the same provision was found of the limitation upon the time the Government was to engage in this undertaking. It seems just as soon, Mr. President, as you have started in this enterprise to get far enough along to spend money, to make contracts, to oblige the Government to pay by binding obligations made by the head of some department, so that the whole $50,000,000 has either been expended or obligations created for that expenditure—as soon as that has been done, the Government abandons the undertaking.

That may be good business. I do not so believe. It will be good private business for somebody who buys it in five years, if there is anything in the undertaking at all. When at public auction or private sale, under negotiations provided in the pending bill and by broad discretionary powers invested in the executive department, a disposition has been made of the shipping property, then, I presume, somebody must buy it. Who will buy it? I do not know, neither does the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, nor does the majority party; neither does the Chief Executive.

After a business has been developed, after ships have been bought, operated, or leased, after a freight business has been acquired and a passenger business has been developed by the same processes that any other business requires, then, I presume, whoever buys this going business will get the benefit of what the Government has lost.

What is the difference between subsidizing the steamship companies, whether it is the International Mercantile Marine or any other concern doing business at our ports—what is the difference between subsidizing them now, with all other concerns that are able to carry mail or freight or passengers, and calling it a subsidy direct, and postponing the operation for five years and turning it over to private hands, at last, with all the incidental benefits that belong to the effort of the Government agent and the expenditure of Government funds?

That is the question I should like to have answered, either in this Chamber or elsewhere, between now and next November: What the difference is between the present shipping bill in its ultimate effect—and that is the way to measure a thing—and a subsidy paid outright and called a subsidy, honestly and without pretense, without mere circumlocution or resounding planks in evasive and never-to-be-kept platforms?

Think about what we have been doing. Here was a Federal reserve bank law that came along in due season. The Federal reserve bank was heralded far and wide as a great banking and fiscal reform. It is now claimed to be a great creative remedial measure; but if the present law be taken and laid alongside of the report of the National Monetary Commission, and if the evidence before that commission be read, it will be found that every solitary permanent good feature of the Federal reserve act is embodied in the report of the Monetary Commission. If there are any errors in the operation, any basic mistakes in the law, it will be found that they have been added, but were not present in the commission's report.

I know it is claimed that that is not a Government undertaking, that it is a mere provision to take care of the reserves of banks; that it did what any wise party in authority would have done without regard to the political complexion of the party then in power. Very well; I do not object to such part of it as provides for the care of the reserves. The part particularly which I wish to note in connection with the shipping bill is the fact that it is not a reserve bank; it is a private pursuit vested, in one of the powers given them, to go out and engage in the banking business.

The Federal reserve law creating the banks, not only extorted from the banks themselves organized under the national banking act, capital to furnish the 12 regional reserve banks enough to do business on, but, in addition to that, it commandeered the reserve of every bank in the country that was obliged by a compulsory act to enter it. After the capital stock had been subscribed in this compulsory manner under an act of Congress, the power was found to belong to the Federal reserve banks to go out on the market, and engage in a private banking business.

It is found in that portion of the Federal reserve act which authorizes the Federal reserve banks to buy bills of exchange or acceptances. There is the open gate for the Federal reserve banks to engage to an unlimited degree in private banking, so that the banks which were compelled to enter the system furnish the capital only to create competitors, to take away their own business. That is one tendency of the majority toward interfering with private pursuits; that is one of the same kind with the shipping bill.

Akin to this, but not in point of time, came the rural-credits bill, providing for the organization of land banks. It is pretty well understood that there are only certain sections of the country which will avail themselves of the privileges of the rural-credits act. No one believes that in any part of the country where farm land is now of any settled value a solitary farmer's association will be created for the purpose through the agency of the district bank of effecting loans.

In all the great Northwest, of which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] spoke, all of the northern Mississippi Valley country, everything tributary to the great Father of Waters—in that country, and especially in the States where land has a fixed value, where it does not fluctuate largely from year to year, where it is not doubtful security, there is nobody asking for a rural-credits scheme. Money already loans at 5 per cent. You can borrow for 10 years if you want to do so, or longer, with the option of paying what you make out of the farm at given intervals, semiannually or even less if you like.

The great insurance companies of New York City and elsewhere have loaned millions of dollars in the Northwest on farm lands. Their terms are favorable, the values are known, and no losses have occurred. So when we analyze the rural-credits legislation, in its practical application, it is found that it only applies to certain portions of our country. What will be the natural result? It will come back to this eternal question of the Government engaging, through the power of taxation and taking money out of the Public Treasury, in what is essentially a private pursuit.

Anybody can organize, if he secures a sufficient number to associate themselves with him, or cause to be organized, a district rural-credits bank. If the private subcribers do not take the stock, the Government can subscribe for the shares.

The Government having subscribed for the shares, where will it get the money to pay? The Government has no funds; the Government is always a chronic bankrupt; the Government has no assets of any kind except the inexhaustible resources of the taxpayers.

So it means that when the Government is to subscribe, in the event that private subscription does not provide for taking the shares, it comes out of the Treasury. That is exercising the power of taxation for the purpose of loaning money to private borrowers. That is where it ends, and that is where it links itself up with a part of the pernicious and inexcusable policy announced in the shipping bill. It is the underlying disease of which the shipping bill is merely a manifestation.

The nitrate plant was provided for in due season. It was a part of the preparedness measures. Well, we had just as well start an overall factory; we had just as well start a factory for undershirts, for shoes, for toothbrushes, or for dental supplies, because they are all needed by the soldiery.

Armor plate came along in the same way. Eleven million dollars were appropriated for an armor-plate factory and $20,000,000 for a nitrate plant. All of these expenditures, of course, require appropriations from the Treasury. They are of the same kind as the shipping bill, the Alaska railway legislation, and every other scheme that embarks the Government in the ownership and operation of what is essentially a private pursuit.

In a general way this is one objection I have to the shipping bill, that it seeks to embark the Government in what is essentially a private undertaking. What are the reasons given for it? I have heard them here. I have heard them as I heard them in 1915, when the shipping bill was up for passage, and I have heard them since that time. I think the Senator from South Dakota is correct when he says that public opinion approved the defeat of the shipping bill. I do not believe there is a Senator now in the Chamber, or who would be entitled to be in the Chamber if he were present, who ever lost a vote because of his attitude in opposition to the shipping bill at the last session of Congress.

Well, it is said that freight rates especially have been very high. Is there anything else high? I come from a part of the country where there is a great wheat market. I have been noticing a considerable change in the prices of wheat and flour. Let us see about that, Mr. President.

"Chicago market, July 12, 1916"——

That was before the crop reports came out; that was before in certain places the rust and the drouth and the flies and a good many other troublesome things had made short the wheat yield.

The Chicago market on barreled flour July 12, 1916, showed that the price ran from $4.95 to $5.10 per barrel for flour made out of spring wheat. The soft winter wheat patent flour ran from $4.90 to $5.10. The straight wheat ran from $4.50 to $4.80. The clear ran from $4 to $4.30. The hard winter wheat flour, patent, $4.70 to $5; straight, $4.45 to $4.65; and clear, from $4 to $4.25.

I quote from the Chicago market August 11, 1916, just a month later, counting one day and excluding the other. Here are the cash transactions in the same pit, the same surroundings, the same men, the same brokers, around the flour and the grain pit down at the foot of La Salle Street.

Spring wheat in wood—that is, a wooden barrel—$8.10.

Hard spring wheat, patent, in jute bags, $6.60 to $6.80.

Straight, in exporters' bags, $6.60, and from $5.70 to $5.90.

Seconds, $3.95 to $4.10.

In jute, hard winter wheat flour, $6.25, and from $5.95 to $5.70.

The dark rye flour—I did not have the quotation for July, but it is proportionately about the same per cent—ran from $5.35 to $5.65.

Now, these are all breadstuffs. Gold Medal flour on the same day in the city of Washington was $9.35 a barrel. If taken in five-barrel lots from the jobber in Washington, with 10 days for payment, you got a $9 rate, net.

I only read this series of quotations to show that a mere rise in prices is not dependent upon conspiracies at home, upon sedition among business men, or upon attempts to rob anybody. These things follow the ebb and flow of the demand on the market and of the supply that is accessible. The immutable laws of markets exceed the power even of a congressional investigating committee. You may investigate until your breath fails; you may legislate, and the puny fiats of legislation will never change the laws of trade that are as unceasing and changeless as the tides that follow salt water around the world. Still, here we have as one argument, Mr. President, the statement that we must go into the Government shipping business because freight rates have advanced.

Why, why not go to raising wheat and manufacturing flour? Why not take part of the public domain, transport the future Coxey's armies that are always incident, in times of peace, to a Democratic administration, out on the Government domain and go to raising wheat, so that the suffering poor may have cheap bread? Why not start a mill? Why these alleged great monopolies at Minneapolis, the great milling companies? Why the large milling companies in Kansas City and St. Louis and at Alton, Ill., and elsewhere on the Mississippi River? Why not enter into competition with them because flour is quoted at from $6.10 to $9.35 a barrel on the 12th day of August, and the 11th day of July preceding it was quoted at from $5 to $6.90? Somebody, I suppose, is stealing.

Why does not the Government start a mill? Why does it not start a bakeshop? Because I know from certain press dispatches, if they are to be credited, that the bakers have been taking a few ounces out of the loaf of bread. They either had to do that or raise the price. The people have grown accustomed to a 5-cent loaf, and they thought it better to subtract an ounce or two from the loaf and still let the price stand. It would be just as sensible in the one case to argue from a given condition to a necessary remedy as it would in the other.

Here is another manifestation of the general disease; and I apprehend that this gentleman would not have made this statement and submitted to the interview unless his mother wit informed him of the general tendency of this administration. It would be regarded as in line with other things. It would popularize him with his chief. From St. Louis, Mo., under the date line of July 16, 1916, is a press report interviewing Mr. J. J. Keegan. Who is Mr. Keegan? He is known to fame as a labor commissioner of the United States Department of Labor. I suppose, being done in the name of an alleged labor leader, whatever is said, however insane, however frantic, however insufferably and sublimely idiotic, is sanctified thereby, and no one shall criticize it. I shall, however, proceed to do so, even if Mr. Keegan should be offended. Like Mr. Gompers, he seeks to issue edicts and have them obeyed by everybody everywhere.

No more insufferable control or tyranny ever cursed a country than these parasitical men who exploit labor and live off the sweat of somebody else's brow. Mr. Gompers is a public nuisance. Mr. Keegan is a Socialist, or in all probability what might be denominated an economic crank; and they are the ones who find lodgment in high places and are in high favor in this administration, from Redfield clear down to Mr. Keegan, or clear up, I do not know which it is.

I wish to say, before I leave that subject—I will make a finish of it while I am at it—that a year or two ago Mr. Gompers started to criticize a number of gentlemen in public life who refused in this Chamber to vote to exclude unions from prosecution like anybody else under a certain $300,000 appropriation devoted to the Department of Justice for the purpose of prosecuting those who violated the antitrust law.

I will say now what I said publicly in 1914 about Mr. Gompers. Before Mr. Gompers criticizes any one in public life I ask him to remember that in the conspiracy leading to the indictment of the dynamiters at Indianapolis, Ind., before they were tried, before the instrumentalities provided by the Department of Justice had resulted in a public hearing where justice might be administered, Mr. Gompers set up a tribunal of his own and tried them and had them acquitted. He prostituted the cause of labor to the point of using the funds of the laboring men of this country to defend these criminals who had without cause, wantonly, in cold blood, sent to their death 19 men and women in the city of Los Angeles, Cal.

After he had tried them and found them innocent, almost before the ink was dry upon his statement of their innocence, the McNamaras pleaded guilty, and are now engaged in penal pursuits at the behest of an indulgent State where they are removed from the scene of their murderous activities.

Mr. Gompers has never apologized to the law-abiding men of the country, but here and now I say the most fortunate thing that has ever happened to Mr. Gompers is that he escaped indictment himself upon a similar charge in the same conspiracy.

I am not talking now as a party man, but an American. I know something of it from beginning to end. One of my neighbors was convicted in connection with the same conspiracy. He served out his time like a man, and he is abroad now making a living for his family. He was convicted because he wrote certain letters. He said he did not know what they meant. It might be he did not. He merely did what a superior ordered. The employer or owner was asked by the leaders to unionize a shop, or a series of shops, and he did not do it, and so the dynamiting followed and a jury found my neighbor guilty with the others.

It is high time some one said a few wholesome things of Mr. Gompers. It will serve to arrest a vicious tendency to let him run riot in the methods of intimidation and coercion he has habitually employed against men of both parties for several years.

Gird up your loins, Mr. Gompers, and answer me like a man. I will teach him a few degrees of active, practical civic decency in my country that he does not know of if he will only come out and give the people a chance.

Here is one of this distinguished gentleman's disciples:

ST. LOUIS, July 16.

Immediate seizure of every railroad in the United States by the Federal Government, with Government ownership as a certain result, was predicted to-night in an interview by J. J. Keegan, commissioner of the United States Department of Labor, should the threatened strike of the four great railroad brotherhoods become a reality.

Keegan would not say that plans have been formulated for such governmental action, but declared that, according to his information and belief, the step will be inevitable.

REFERS TO RESOLUTION.

He referred to the resolution introduced in Congress Saturday by Senator NEWLANDS, authorizing the appointment of a commission to study the general question of Government ownership and operation of railroads.

Keegan pointed out the Interstate Commerce Commission has been appraising for three years the valuation of the railroads of the United States, declared the Government, as a result, is better prepared than ever before to assume the responsibility of ownership.

SAYS VOTE WILL CARRY.

"From the best information I have," declared the labor commissioner, "I am confident the great rank and file of the four brotherhoods will vote for a strike. I am led to believe more than 99 per cent of the members of the four great organizations will vote for a 'walk out.'

"I do not believe, however, a strike is probable. I can not reconcile such a development under existing conditions. I can not conceive that other railroad management or brotherhood officials will permit the break.

That is only introductory.

GOVERNMENT WILL ACT.

"But if the break should come and 450,000 trainmen were called out, paralyzing the transportation facilities of the country, and even threatening American people with starvation, the Federal Government will act within 24 hours. Once these roads pass into the control of the United States, they never will be returned to private ownership."

There you are, and that is what is going to happen. We will have all the steamships for freight and passenger service. We have in Alaska a railroad to begin with; we have one across the Isthmus of Panama as a starter. We will acquire, as soon as this strike reaches the point indicated by this gentleman, the control of the railroads because of the cessation of their operations. Then, having assumed control in order to tide over the period of the strike, the Government is to retain them and operate them permanently.

That is leading on toward that beatific period described by some of my friends on a soap box—very often out on the curbstone. I do not know just how much room there is between Mr. Gompers and these gentlemen.

Mr. Gompers is now supporting the Democratic ticket and I am perfectly satisfied to have him do so. He is welcome, and the party is welcome to his support. I do not know what his original politics was, if he ever had any. I think he follows about the same characteristics as the McNamara brothers do, and preys upon all in turn, playing no favorites at any time where benefits can be acquired.

So there is another of the blessed periods that will soon arrive. I apprehend, as he is connected with the Department of Labor, that Mr. Keegan does not anticipate any violent reprimands from his chief. The whole of the administration, from end to end, is permeated from head to foot with just such pernicious doctrines and beliefs as I have indicated. The purpose of the majority of the members of the Cabinet, of the responsible leaders in the House, and of many of the responsible leaders in this Chamber has been to hurry the Government toward the goal of indiscriminate ownership and operation of private pursuits of every character.

Why, here is Brother Redfield, of the Cabinet. Brother Redfield is now saying that we must have a duty on dyestuffs. Well, that is the first time I have ever agreed with him.

I do not know whether it will be a permanent agreement or whether he will change his mind overnight. He reserves that right, as all statesmen do. He referred, in an address delivered about a year ago, to why a duty on dyestuffs was desirable, and it indicates how extremely sensitive he has grown. He would not call it a protective duty, but he said a duty on dyestuffs was justifiable because we would protect an incipient industry. "Incipient!" He would not use the term "infant industry," but "incipient industry."

Now, I understand by hobnobbing with the medical fraternity that the word "incipient" applies to diseases like measles, smallpox, typhoid fever, etc., and when you get it you trace it first in its incipient stages—a kind of a scourge to mankind. So an industry is to be described as an incipient industry because it is more or less a scourge, and it is to be avoided and evaded as a public nuisance whenever and wherever found.

The last time I remember this affable gentleman being out in my country was when the Eastland turned over in the Chicago River. He came out posthaste. He held an informal investigation. He assumed jurisdiction because it was a vessel that might engage in interstate commerce. He ousted the coroner of Cook County, Mr. Hoffman, and said that this was a matter for the Government to handle. Mr. Hoffman very kindly withdrew his ministrations upon the thousand or more dead who were in the buildings adjacent to the scene of the disaster.

Mr. Redfield pursued his investigation with great industry for at least eight hours, to inquire how more than a thousand people came to their unwarranted death.

He returned a verdict—not a coroner's verdict but a verdict of the Secretary of Commerce. His verdict was that everybody was competent; that the inspectors and everybody who ought to have prevented it were vigilant; that no negligence had been shown; that it was an unavoidable accident, a merciful dispensation of Providence that a thousand people had been drowned in a vessel over which he claimed and was allowed to have exclusive jurisdiction. He became for the time being the crown prince of jesters and the colossal governmental joke of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Redfield is now engaged in giving advice to the business men of this country, those who have followed their business all their lives, in every occupation. Mr. Redfield is telling them how to run their business. This is an instance of what the Government can do when it engages in private business. Why, it can not even regulate a fellow that is running a business successfully. It can not make him behave himself; and the Lord knows, if it can not do that, and it undertakes to run the business itself, how much the bigger fool will it make of itself through its governmental departments! And still we want to take up something else, something new, more governmental undertakings, shipping bills and the like.

Where will we build the ships? That is what the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] inquired. That is what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] intimated. Where will we find the facilities for building the ships?

Why, here is the report made by Capt. Bertholf, commandant of the Coast Guard. It is found on page 275 of the hearings of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce. Here is what he says about it:

> The Department of Commerce publishes each month in their Commerce Reports a résumé of the ship construction showing the total volume, the yards in which the ships are being constructed, and the new construction taken on each month. The statement is issued monthly. The statement for May was issued only a few days ago; therefore it has not been entirely analyzed, but up to the 1st of May, 1916, we find this:
> "One million one hundred and twenty-nine thousand and fourteen total tonnage building; of this 79,600 tons are for foreign ownership and 1,049,414 for American ownership.
> "Of the foreign-owned vessels 59,200 tons are fuel-oil carriers, 2,100 passenger and cargo, and 18,300 for cargo ships.
> "Of the 1,049,414 tons being built for American ownership, 610,782 tons are for special uses, such as fuel oil, bulk ore, colliers, molasses carriers, and small boats for miscellaneous purposes. Of the remaining 438,632 tons, 228,285 are for the coasting and Great Lakes trade, 144,617 for the foreign trade, and 65,738 doubtful."

Being on the stocks, probably it is not yet definitely decided in what branch of the ocean carriage or water-carrying service they shall engage.

I again refer, before leaving this idea, to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, dated at this Capital October 2, 1915, which is the latest published official report. Some summaries of monthly reports can be had to which I have referred here, or to which Capt. Bertholf referred in the hearings before the subcommittee.

In this report of the Commissioner of Navigation I find the following:

> On June 30, 1915, the merchant marine of the United States, including all kinds of documented shipping, comprised 26,701 vessels of 8,389,429 gross tons. On June 30, 1914, it comprised 26,943 vessels of 7,928,688 gross tons. The year's absolute increase in tonnage, 460,741 gross tons, has never been equaled in our history.

That was a period running from the 30th day of June, 1914, to the 30th day of June, 1915. The German armies crossed the Belgian frontier on the 3d day of August, 1914, for offensive and invading purposes; so the war, as it might affect a world-wide commerce and the tonnage of the world, may fairly be said to date from the 3d day of August, 1914. In the year, or less than a year, accounted for by the Commissioner of Navigation, nearly half a million increase in the gross tonnage of the shipping of the United States occurred.

> In 1854 the increase was 395,892 tons.

This was a period when the shipping of this country had developed to a remarkable degree.

The discriminatory rates advocated by the Senator from Washington were in force at that time. Whether the like provision would cause a like development now or not probably can not be mathematically demonstrated. It would require, as has been intimated by the Senator from Washington and others, an abrogation or a modification at least of many treaties in order that we might make effective some preferential rate, either by reducing the rate of the regular schedule of import rates or by raising the regular rate 5 or 10 per cent above in order to favor the merchandise imported in vessels carrying our colors.

At any rate, I have referred to the tonnage of 1854 and the commerce of that year.

In 1855, 409,099 tons and in 1908 it was 426,651 tons. In tonnage and value the merchant shipping under the American flag is surpassed only by that under the British flag, and in tonnage it equals that under any other two foreign flags combined, except the British. Statements of the merchant tonnage of foreign nations are printed in Appendix F. Statistical Tables 10 and 17 show the progress of American shipping.

American shipping registered for the foreign trade, included in the figures above, numbered on June 30, 1915, 2,794 vessels of 1,871,543 gross tons, an increase during the year of 389 vessels and 795,391 gross tons. This increase is three times as great as the increase in registered tonnage during any previous year in our history.

Our tonnage enrolled and licensed for the coasting or domestic trade on June 30, 1915, numbered 23,907 vessels of 6,517,886 gross tons, a decrease of 631 vessels and 334,650 gross tons since June 30, 1914. The decrease is greater, in fact, than in any other year in our history, though greater apparent decreases were recorded during the years 1865–66, and 1875–76. At the close of the Civil War collectors of customs throughout the country revised their records, and vessels lost during the war, but carried through the war in the statistical returns, were removed from those returns. In 1873–74 Congress exempted from customhouse documents a large amount of tonnage employed on canals and harbors and, thereafter, of course, this tonnage was not included in statistical returns though it continued in its customary employment. Last year upward of 200,000 tons of our shipping, formerly in domestic trade, secured employment in foreign trade.

The changes in our merchant shipping within the 12 months have no parallel in extent in our maritime history. The nearest approach is furnished by the fiscal years 1863 and 1864, when the Confederate cruisers were in operation and 523,064 tons of American shipping were sold to foreigners. During the past year under the ship-registry act of August 18, 1914, a total of 148 vessels of 523,361 gross tons were transferred from foreign flags to the American flag and register. These transfers, however, unlike those of 1863–64, in very few cases involved a change in the actual beneficiary ownership, but a change in the ownership of record, possible only through the passage of the act of August 18, 1914, which enabled American owners to secure American registry and the use of their own flag for ships built in foreign countries. The transfer of very few of these ships, accordingly, involved an increase in the investment of American capital in maritime ventures. They represent in all an investment of $33,392,756.58, but Americans had invested nine-tenths of this capital in these ships long before the outbreak of the European war. At prices current during the year these ships, if purchased, would have cost more than the amount just stated.

Until the passage of the act of August 18, 1914, it was not possible for such owners generally to give to their ships their true national character. It may be that had full opportunity been afforded earlier, it would not have been seized. That question is somewhat academic, as in any event the door was closed against them. The more pertinent question is whether the national advantage gained during the past year is to be retained by legislation giving freer scope in maritime ventures to American citizens of enterprise and capital, who in a few months have given to the American merchant flag on the sea a rank and importance second only to the British. In the bitterness of feeling that followed immediately upon the close of the Civil War the opportunity to recover a lost position was thrown away when Congress by the act of February 10, 1866 (sec. 4135, R. S.), specifically forbade the return to American registry of ships which had been sold to foreigners "during the existence of the rebellion."

The European war has created an opportunity for the development of the American merchant marine in foreign trade which this generation, at least, is not likely to see repeated. The most efficient instrumentalities for the prosecution of that trade are ocean steamers of 3,000 gross tons and upward. Such ships are economical by comparison with smaller vessels, and it is by means of larger steamers that the great volume of our bulk exports must be carried abroad. An idea of the progress which has been made under the ship-registry act of August, 1914, toward an American merchant marine able to compete with foreign shipping can be formed more readily, perhaps, from a glance at the number of such ocean steamers under different flags than from a study of the totals of gross tonnage.

The following table, compiled from Lloyd's Register for June 30, 1915—the only trustworthy authority for so recent a date—shows the number of ocean steamers over 3,000 gross tons, roughly divided as to size, under the various flags named, German steamers, of course, having no share in the carrying trade:

This remarkable increase in the year 1914 and 1915 indicates that there is a tremendous activity in every private shipyard in this country. I do not know of the manager or the responsible head of a single shipyard in the country from San Francisco to Baltimore who would not tell you that his yard has contracted up to its full capacity, that they could take no more with any reasonable expectation of completing it before the European war closed.

Now, what is the emergency? The European war. How long will it last? Nobody but the Infinite in His wisdom can tell. He may know the course of mankind in peace and war; we do not. It is pure speculation. But basing our views upon exhaustion, upon what Grant termed the process of attrition, the destruction of men, and the full limit of governmental credit, the war might run for two years. That would carry it to 1918. The puny efforts made by the Government, by $50,000,000, through a shipping board in the two years, would accomplish no more than, as I have already indicated, the expenditure or contracting to expend the $50,000,000 to be provided by the Public Treasury.

Mr. President, we are about to engage in another experiment. This is purely of a governmental character, but nevertheless it will require the expenditure of public funds. In a few days we will be engaged in the delectable occupation of trying to find money to pay the appropriation fiddler. In the due course of human events the chairman of the Committee on Finance will report out a revenue bill. The science of government, an English statesman said at one time, was how to pluck the most feathers out of the goose with the least squawking.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask my friend the Senator from Illinois if he has any definite information as to when that bill is to come before this body.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I regret to say, much as I should like to give the Senator more definite information, I am wholly unable to do so. It belongs to that category of future nebulous and undefined events that even the wisest man on this side of the Chamber, I think, would not be able to answer satisfactorily. It slumbers in the recesses of the majority side of the committee. It is in process, if I might use a medical phrase, of gestation, and what it will be when it comes out even that side do not know yet, much less we poor worms who creep about on this side.

But we are about to engage in a further expenditure of money. We will be required when that bill does come out to levy taxes in various ways, direct and indirect, to raise something like $1,650,000,000 or $1,700,000,000. I am approximating it at $1,650,000,000, and I am fairly within the limits when I do so.

A part of it is the trifling sum of $25,000,000 to cover the Danish West Indies. That will come in as a part of this $50,000,000 for the shipping bill, and it must be considered along with the rest of it, because we have to raise the money somehow.

I figure on the population of St. Croix, St. Johns, and St. Thomas, according to the latest estimates of the population I can get. I quote from a very distinguished authority from 1896 down to 1908, excluding a distressing hiatus in 1904 when he was not so much in the public gaze.

You remember the issue, Mr. President [Mr. LEWIS in the chair], when you and I on opposite sides of this controversy burned up the prairie grass in our State. It was said that by the treaty of Paris, ratified in April following 1899, we had bought a great number of human beings by the head for $20,000,000 when we acquired the Philippine Islands.

Now, we are getting a bargain, Mr. President, in what we are doing to-day, if we follow out the dictates of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and ratify this treaty, because we will get a mixed job lot at $750 a head—black, white, yellow, of all sexes, ages, and previous conditions of servitude—because up to 1848 they had slavery in the islands, and the sugar plantations have gone down since they can not get cheap labor any more. Now, it is not quite so valuable property. Although in 1867 we had an offer of all three of them for $7,500,000, we did not buy at that time. In 1902 we had an offer of two of them for $5,000,000. We did not buy. Now, we have an offer of all three of them at $25,000,000, and notwithstanding the issues that have been raised in years past we are to buy this motley outfit, good, bad, and indifferent, as that might be, with all the population, for the sum named.

One of the islands, St. Thomas, is 13 miles east and west and 3 miles north and south. It looks like a diagonal German sausage in the Caribbean Sea. Its area is 33 square miles, not quite as large as a township out in the corn belt. It contains 21,920 acres, and its population in 1901 was 11,012 people. In 1880 it was 14,389. It has been decreasing in population. From our viewpoint it may be the fewer population the better, if it is a habitable place for anybody. The last time there was any accurate return made of the population one-sixth of it was white and the other was of indefinite quality; some of them were a blend, as the coffee men say.

St. Croix is 40 miles east from St. Thomas 23 miles long, and 6 miles wide, with an area of 51,168 acres. Its population in 1880 was 18,567. In 1901 it was 18,430. It has fallen off now.

St. Johns in 1835 had a population of 2,475, and in 1901 it had a population of 925. Its area is 35 square miles. It has 22,400 acres, and there is a total of 94,688 acres in the three islands.

I shall vote to ratify this treaty, if the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations will ever bring it out in executive session. I will vote, in addition, to consider it in the open session of the Senate. If we are going to spend $25,000,000, there will be a large part of that drawn from the citizens of the State of New York, the citizens of the State of Massachusetts and the State of Pennsylvania, and the States of Illinois and Indiana, Iowa, and Missouri. Four of the States alone will pay nearly $76,000,000 of the income tax alone, and they will pay more money of the $25,000,000 out of that item alone than all the rest of the 44 States of the Union put together.

So it is well enough for us to think about it a little.

I tell you what I am in favor of. I am in favor of taking the $25,000,000 that William Jennings Bryan said that we would pay to Colombia to soothe her lacerated feelings in matters growing out of the Panama Canal—I am in favor of taking that $25,000,000 away from that proposed expenditure and taking the Danish Islands named here and use them as a naval base, fortify them in order to protect our entrance to the Panama Canal and the Panama Canal itself. I am somewhat in favor of getting all the islands in the Caribbean Basin that we can without conquest. If it can be done by diplomacy, by negotiation, by purchase, I am in favor of taking them.

We are already down in Haiti. We have something to do with Santo Domingo. We have a Government receivership in both places—in one at least now. There is no trouble about it.

That reminds me, when I come to think about it, that one of these, Santo Domingo, is the place where Walter W. Vick is the receiver general of the customs of that bankrupt Government that we are administering, setting apart a portion of the public revenue to pay matured principal and interest on the public debt issued by it at various times in its emergency, with the rest of it devoted to the administration of its domestic affairs.

I remember about a year or more ago, when we were considering the shipping bill, of some ill-advised remarks that made it proper for me at that time to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this letter, and I now repeat the offense. It is dated August 20, 1913. It shows just how the plank in the platform of 1912 adverted to the abounding affection with which the party at Baltimore loved the civil-service law. Well, we must make some allowance in the exuberance of imagination, in the enthusiasm of the moment, for these things. But while the senior Senator from Missouri said at one time that the voice of that convention, where my name was feebly mentioned, still lingered in my ears, I wish to say to the Senator that I was nearer being the nominee of my party than he will ever be of his. I had more delegates in my State than good old Missouri will ever have, because we grow faster than you do, even counting St. Louis and Kansas City. So it is not uncomplimentary for me to say that I wish to explain to the Senator that, because of the mere accident of our local habitation, if nothing more, it will be so.

I want to show how the party to which I have referred administer government and how fit they are, Mr. President, to run a shipping board and to start with $50,000,000 a rival Government line to all quarters of the globe to compete with every civilized power, for that is what they are going to do.

Ah, the one-time president of a university heading the great people's party, where the people rule, will by mere edict of Congress say to all the shipping lines of the world, "Peace; be still; get away off the seas; Uncle Sam is coming, and his name is Woodrow." Every great maritime power will hie to their home ports and leave to us the salt sea as our own.

Here is what they did in 1912, Mr. President. Let me get that platform plank into the RECORD, because it is first-class reading. Of course, it is largely fictitious, but then the most pleasing things for the amusement of the human mind are works of fiction. The great novelists of the world understand that. So from Cervantes, with his matchless Don Quixote; Balzac, with his portrayal of human nature and of French life; Dickens, all the way through, have instructed the world by fiction; and it may be that the purpose of writing such planks in the platform is either to amuse or to instruct—to amuse for a summer holiday or to instruct the public just how much the plank and promises in a platform may be relied on.

That plank in the Democratic platform reads:

> The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed, for all officers and employees.

I might spend a great deal of time, more or less usefully, in saying how that reorganization has proceeded; but that would consume probably more space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than I ought to impose upon the Government Printing Office. The reorganization, however, has proceeded apace, and with considerable rapidity.

The fourth-class postmasters had been covered into the civil service by Executive orders in former years. I will not undertake to say why that was done; but it was done. It may be that it was a sort of a bomb-proof shelter in the event of misfortune overtaking the party then in power. That may have been the reason of the practical politicians. It may have been a genuine regard for the civil-service principle. I shall not undertake to analyze their motives, because that is often a more or less hopeless as well as impossible pursuit. Nevertheless it was done, Mr. President. It was done in pursuance of the law on the subject vesting that power in the Executive. So those postmasters were all under the civil-service law when the calamity fell upon the then majority party in 1912.

On the 7th of May, 1913, an Executive order was issued requiring all fourth-class postmasters to submit to civil-service examination in order to test their fitness to further remain in their places. Strange to say, we have not been able to get any of the records of those examinations.

I will give you, Mr. President, in a single county in my own State, an instance. There I was, in an inadvertent moment, permitted to lift up the curtain of secrecy and view at one time how that examination was administered among the brethren who dwelt together in unity in the Democratic Party in Schuyler County, Ill. It so happened down in the Illinois River bottoms, at a small country village, that an abandoned and perverse Republican had for many years held the post office. Soon a demand was made for his civil-service examination under the Executive order of May 7, 1913. They went in, all of them, with their hearts full of hope, including three Democrats who had been there ever since I fished in that country, more than 28 years ago.

An examination was held. The occupant of the office, who knew everything in it from a bunch of waste paper in the basket clear through to the last ball of twine, utterly failed; he did not know anything about the office. The three Democrats all passed. One had a grade of 71; another a grade of 85; and another a grade of 92. Of course, the man who had 92 thought that his calling and election were sure; but he reckoned, not without hope, it is true, but falsely, in that he did not recognize the human element in politics of which I spoke a while ago in larger affairs.

The man who made 71 was politically active in the township. In that particular county we have the New England form of township organization. He had in many hard-fought battles shed much perspiration for the cause represented by the Government mule. [Laughter.] So his claims, he thought, ought to make up the lack of markings by the civil-service examination; and it so happened that he did not reckon without adequate faith in the reward for those who are "faithful, even unto death" in the Democratic Party. He who had 85—the diligent servant who, in the absence of the master, had so improved his talents, Mr. President, that he made 85 in the markings—and another who had made 92, fell by the wayside, and the Democratic politician of the township prevailed. Civil service promises went glimmering.

That is small, but it is only an indication of larger things. It gives us, to say the least of it, an inkling of why it is that the "great commoner"—he who three times led the party now in the majority in great national campaigns, who sometimes lapses, as he did, for even Jove nods occasionally and the waiting world stops a while, so the "great commoner" from Nebraska was appointed a member of the Cabinet. His chief had remarked once how desirable if some one could find a way of knocking him into a cocked hat. The President found it. There is a difference between performing on a Chautauqua platform and performing in the office of Secretary of State; and herein lies the discomfiture very largely of my beloved friend; a most genial character, and you and I know, Mr. President [Mr. LEWIS in the chair], how we like to sit next to him and touch elbows at the banquet table, when speech goes around and the applause of the multitude sounds into our welcoming ears; of them none is greater than he of Nebraska. So it was that he became identified with the Department of State; and thereby "hangs a tale"—of civil service. [Laughter.]

About that time it became necessary to investigate the island referred to in the West Indies. Mr. J. M. Sullivan was our diplomatic representative there. Some question had arisen between a former Illinois man, Mr. Jarvis, whom probably you, Mr. President, might have known, who had gone down there from New York and engaged in the banking business, and some of his friends. One thing led to another, until the incoming administration had hardly warmed its seat until an investigation was ordered.

Investigations have been going on ever since the time of the insidious lobby during the tariff legislation. We have investigated the bowels out of everything in this country. Everything that is successful has been investigated and has been put upon the grill. Only the unsuccessful have escaped. If there is anything successful anathematize it; if it has made a dollar, if it ever declared a dividend, it must necessarily have been a thief, or it could not have done so. So, when these people were trying to develop a legitimate business down in the island, an investigation naturally was necessary.

While that is not directly connected with the letter I am about to read, that led directly to the publication of the letter, owing to the consuming public interest that was aroused in the affairs of the island. The letter was addressed to Mr. Walter W. Vick, and was dated August 20, 1913. It is as follows:

Now, that you have arrived and have acquainted yourself with the situation, can you let me know what positions you have at your disposal with which to reward deserving Democrats?

Now, that has the Jacksonian ring; that sounds familiar but none the less peculiar if you put it alongside of the square that measures the civil-service plank in the Democratic platform of 1912, which reads:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party.

Compare that with the expression "deserving Democrats." The letter to Mr. Vick continues:

Whenever you desire a suggestion from me in regard to a man for any place down there call on me.

Certainly "call on me." Even in your hour of extremity I will not fail you. If I may be allowed to interpolate a quotation—

You have had enough experience in politics to know how valuable workers are when the campaign is on.

I commend that, Mr. President, to my Democratic brethren at this time. Let no guilty Republican escape. Thrust him into outer darkness. It may be a little difficult for him now. Perhaps the wind can not be tempered to the shorn lamb, but so surely as the frosts of November shall come his reward will be apparent if he no longer is serving the Lord under the suspicious circumstance of holding a position under a Democratic administration. Put him out in order that he may go forth and do his full duty and that some deserving Democrat may fill the vacancy. I know how useful they are.

Opie Reid, in one of his delightful stories of the Southern States, said: "No politician can keep the power in his machine very long unless he has some of the fuel of patronage to put in the fire box." That is what you are doing here. You want something for the fire box. The letter proceeds:

You have had enough experience in politics to know how valuable workers are when the campaign is on and how difficult it is to find suitable rewards for the deserving. I do not know to what extent a knowledge of the Spanish language is necessary for employees.

Well, I suggest, if they can not talk Spanish, we will make them "walk Spanish" between now and November, so that they will get some sort of a Spanish education anyhow. The lack of knowledge of Spanish would not make any difference. If they did not know the language they would not be any worse off than a lot of expensive diplomats who were referred to by my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

I wish to remark here that the most expensive service in the world is the diplomatic service of the United States, because the total of their contributions to the Democratic campaign fund in 1912 footed up $137,250.

The largest contributor, I am proud to say, was my constituent, Charles R. Crane, of Chicago. He inherited his money. The senior Crane, who founded the business of the company, left it to the family. Charles R. realized in good securities and gold standard money, got out of the business, and is now a gentleman of leisure engaged in the profession of uplifting the public service and advancing the public welfare. He is as great a "commonwealer" as Coxey was 25 years ago, when he started to tramp across the continent. [Laughter.]

I wish also to remark, in connection with that subject, that about $21,450 was contributed in the campaign of 1912 by members of new commissions created by Congress since 1913 and by those who were appointed to fill vacancies on old commissions. They come next in the catalogue of financial assets in a campaign.

I say what I have now to say concerning the Cabinet with more or less humility and somewhat of disappointment. Even the immaculate Secretary of Commerce, whom I have come to regard as the court jester of this administration, only gave $100. Do not talk to me about watered stock. He is drawing dividends on watered stock to an extent that exceeds anything in the wildest imagination of any promoter who ever trod this continent. [Laughter.] Josephus Daniels gave $100 and drew a Cabinet place. He knew nothing of the Navy, but he too was a deserving Democrat who had shed several gallons of printers' ink for the cause.

The entire Cabinet only gave $5,582.31. Why, it is no wonder that in the social functions of this Capital a dispute should arise as to where the Cabinet should be in the receiving line, if that is all they are worth in a life and death struggle of the Democracy. [Laughter.]

Heavens, have we fallen to such a low estate that Cabinet positions, when "the unterrified and unwashed" are in the agonies of a fearful wrestle to survive can realize no more of the "needful" than was realized from them in the last campaign, while the diplomatic service can roll up $137,000, and at that two of the appointees declined the positions offered to them.

I am happy to say, Mr. President, that one of the citizens of my State, Harry Pindell, of Peoria, Ill., was appointed minister to Russia, but declined. Harry put up a very modest contribution it is true, but his brethren of the press treated him very unfairly I think, and I do not blame him for declining. It is to his credit he did decline. He has lost nothing and has the respect of his friends more than ever. He never asked for his money back, either. He is a good sport and lets it go when he loses. [Laughter.]

I had, in early life, a somewhat mathematical turn of mind, and when the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this tabulated list of collections, I immediately began to figure up what were the political assets of an administration and what department could realize more fully the expectation of a bountiful harvest.

Having done that, I now continue with the reading of the letter which provoked this digression:

"Let me know what is requisite, together with the salary,"

This bears all the earmarks, not of a great commoner, but of an accomplished politician.

"and when appointments are likely to be made. Sullivan will be down before long"

Now, that is not Roger Sullivan; that is another Sullivan. [Laughter.]

Sullivan will be down before long, and you and he together ought to be able to bring about such reforms as may be necessary there.

I know what the reforms were. Perchance some guilty Republican might linger within the hallowed precincts of a public office. If so, let him be shot at sunrise! Civil service be blanked! Get him!

You will find Sullivan a strong, courageous, reliable fellow. The more I have seen of him the better satisfied I am that he will fit into the place there and do what is necessary to be done.

That is, the beheading—somebody that can wield the ax, just as D. C. Roper left the Post Office Department. Lord knows, if anybody can fry the fat out of the postmasters, it is Roper. He has been the official headsman of the administration going on nearly four years; and if they do not go down in the savings bank and dig up what they have saved out of their salary—if he can not get it, they are hopeless cases. Nothing will produce it—not even the guillotine.

I shall insert the letter entire among the other documents at the end of my remarks.

I have read this plank in 1912. I wish to read that of 1916 on the same subject, because this is a very prolific subject, Mr. President. It is not to be disposed of lightly. What would we do with the shipping bill if it passed carrying fifty millions? Why, we would engage in the South American trade. Would it be necessary for anyone engaged in that service to speak Spanish? What would the salaries be? Are they to be put under the civil service? No place in the printed bill so declares. It is like the Federal reserve act. It is like section 2 of the tariff act. It is like the Executive order taking the deputy marshals and the internal-revenue deputies out from under the civil service. It is like the rural-credits bill. It is like every other department where there has been the creation of new offices. They are expressly exempted from the civil service.

After a while, if the unexpected to my beloved brethren should happen and misfortune should overwhelm them, later on I can think of an Executive order, coming promptly and in the fullness of time, that will cover every one of these devoted gentlemen into the civil service, and every one of them will be snugly down in the trenches, bomb proof. Nothing will get him. Then they will turn around, and if perchance we should discharge a single one of them, with or without cause, they would say, "Why, you civil-service reformers, look at you!" But every one of them went into the service without coming under the provisions of the civil-service act.

So, in 1916, it is not nearly such a lengthy and explicit declaration. It says, in 1916, in the St. Louis platform:

We reaffirm our declarations for the rigid enforcement of the civil-service laws.

That is mighty short. There is not so very much to that, because the least said the better. That is the truth about it.

I now read from another very distinguished authority. I read from a book called "The New Freedom." I will say that the edition I have was published in 1914. The title-page says:

THE NEW FREEDOM.

A call for the emancipation of the generous energies of a people. By Woodrow Wilson.

As a preface, in order to point the moral and adorn the tale, Mr. President, I wish to call particular attention to some fruitless activities of the National Civil Service Association. They have been trying to have access to the records. They have corresponded with Mr. McIlhenny, the chairman of the commission, in an effort to see the eligible lists from which divers appointments have been made. So far they have failed. Either intentionally or inadvertently, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission said, in his answer to the letters of the president of the National Civil Service Association, that he declined to make the civil-service records public, as it would, or might, embarrass the administration. Later on, in further correspondence, it is true, he said that he meant that in merely a Pickwickian sense; that it was rather figurative, so to speak. But later President Wilson says:

I would advise that the correspondence which you have furnished me is being referred to the Civil Service Commission with the suggestion that—the information asked for be published in the commission's annual report for 1916.

When will we get that? Oh, along about the time another President is inaugurated. We may get it the first Monday in December, 1916; but that comes after the November election.

Further, it is said here that it would be inimical to the public interests to allow the records of the administration to be made public and to be used indiscriminately by malicious and partisan enemies.

And so the matter ended, and nothing has been done up to this time; and it will not be, Mr. President, notwithstanding the clamorous demands of the National Civil Service League, notwithstanding that past administrations have given access with, in 1899, not more than a two months' interval; notwithstanding all that, there will be no searching of the records. There will be no "pitiless publicity" in these records between now and the November election.

Having made this preface, I now wish to read from the book to which I refer.

What are the right methods of politics?

He inquires.

Why, the right methods are those of public discussion; the methods of leadership open and aboveboard, not closeted with "boards of guardians" or anybody else, but brought out under the sky, where honest eyes can look upon them and honest eyes can judge of them.

If there is nothing to conceal, then why conceal it?

That is not my language; that is the book's.

If it is a public game, why play it in private?

What are you playing it in private for? Open up! Let us see what you have been doing, if you want to play a public game.

If it is a public game, then why not come out into the open and play it in public?

Why do not you do it, you Executive head of this administration? Come out in public, and let us see what your Civil Service Commission and what the hungry faithful have done with their records and how it appears. Let me take it from the little insignificant Illinois case I referred to, and let us see how many other cases there are.

Why, I noticed in the list presented by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania the name of Thomas Fox, of Sacramento. Does that bring any reviving memory to your ears of a certain occasion that I am not allowed to refer to? Why, he is postmaster of Sacramento, and I think I am not guilty of any breach of good manners when I say there was some considerable disturbance before he was finally settled down as a deserving Democrat enjoying the rewards of the faithful. Thomas Fox was only down for $100. He is another case of watered stock. He is getting a tremendous return on a small investment.

I, for one, have the conviction that government ought to be all outside and no inside. I for my part believe that there ought to be no place where anything can be done that everybody does not know about. It would be very inconvenient for some gentlemen, probably, if government were all outside, but we have consulted their susceptibilities too long already. It is barely possible that some of these gentlemen are unjustly suspected; in that case they owe it to themselves to come out and operate in the light. The very fact that so much in politics is done in the dark, behind closed doors, promotes suspicion. * * * You know there is temptation in loneliness and secrecy.

I wish this particularly to go in the RECORD, because I am going to use it in this campaign. I will just admit right now candidly, Mr. President, that I expect to use this, and I am reading it with malice aforethought here and now, so that I can sort of get used to it.

Haven't you experienced it? I have. We are never so proper in our conduct as when everybody can look and see exactly what we are doing.

Physician, heal thyself!

If you are off in some distant part of the world and suppose that nobody who lives within a mile of your home is anywhere around, there are times when you adjourn your ordinary standards. You say to yourself, Well, I'll have a fling this time; nobody will know anything about it.

In the same chapter, continuing on the same subject, leaving out some matter interpolated that is not so directly pertinent on this point:

I hold the opinion that there can be no confidences as against the people with respect to their Government, and that it is the duty of every public officer to explain to his fellow citizens whenever he gets the chance, explain exactly what is going on inside of his own office. There is no air so wholesome as the air of utter publicity.

I heard a good deal about "pitiless publicity" along in the early part of the campaign. Now, it has gone the way of "watchful waiting." It has perished. People are beginning to realize that government by phrase making is an ignominious failure. It is one thing in the Chicago platform to call the attention of the majority party to its performances in language. It is a piece of platform sarcasm; but, nevertheless, it is based upon the unchanging truth, "performances in language." So we do not hear anything of "pitiless publicity" any more, and we will not for a long time, except as the minority party produces the publicity. We want to get the records. We can not. I have compiled some here to which I intend to give a little pitiless publicity, Mr. President, before the ides of November come.

I remember the last time I was in Chicago, last week, some of my friends got to talking to me about Mr. Gompers. I said: "I am going to pay my respects to Mr. Gompers whenever I feel like it. He does not carry the labor vote of this country around in his pocket. He does not own it. I will take the chances on dividing it. Mr. Gompers is not the uncrowned king of the labor world, although he is temporarily the head of the American Federation of Labor.

He is a Democrat. He never was anything else. He is a partisan and is now attempting to prostitute his official position as head of the American Federation of Labor to the election of the Democratic ticket. My friend said, "It will not be wise for you to say so." I said, "I am going to say it, anyhow, and say it on my own responsibility."

If you will pardon me, Mr. President, I will quote the words of the King in Hamlet:

> You must not think
> That we are made of stuff so flat and dull
> That we can let our beard be shook with danger
> And think it pastime.

So I will let it go. I expressly disclaim any responsibility for anybody except myself.

Here is some "pitiless publicity." I shall give the last chapter of this when I can get it. I am not able to complete it yet because the majority party have not yet completed their labors in Congress, and that is where most of this must come from. I will say that I think the salaries of offices created by the gross sum appropriations, which are estimated as about the same as those of the specific offices, and this is as near as you can approximate it, are too low, giving too high a number.

New offices created and appropriations therefor by Democratic Congress and approved by Democratic President, and by Republican Congress and approved by Republican President for the several years named.

Year.	Specific number new offices.	Approximate number new offices (gross appropriations.)	Specific appropriations.	Gross appropriations
1910	3,877	6,500	$5,672,009.00	$2,027,224.00

Total Republican	18,686		23,869,957.53

In the three years of Democratic administration they have created 30,000 new offices. The appropriations for those new offices are $37,269,722.01.

When all the killed, wounded, and missing come in for 1916 from appropriations and from the departments we may confidently expect that there will be between 5,000 and 6,000 more added for the last year, because it is known, Mr. President, that in the last year provisions have been made for many new offices in the departments; new commissions have been created; new pay rolls have been created here and there and everywhere. When the final fiscal history of this administration is written for the last four years it will be found that a large part of the increased expenditures have come from the useless creation of new offices with the consequent compensation attached to them.

It has occurred to me that if the administration does know better——

Mr. LIPPITT. Before the Senator finishes the part of the subject to which he is now devoting his attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIPPITT. What was the total amount of new expenditures that the Senator mentioned—some $37,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Over $37,000,000.

Mr. LIPPITT. Do I understand that $37,000,000 is the sum of money that will be an annual tax upon the Government for all future time for these new employees?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is not merely something that has happened for this year?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator means that the Democracy have so arranged and increased the number of employees of the Government that for all time, until their laws are rescinded, the Government will be under an additional expense of some $40,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct. That is a permanent increase.

Mr. PENROSE. And, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I think it can be further shown that the greater part of the employees were appointed outside of the civil service from the ranks of the Democracy; and in my opinion not 50 per cent of them are performing official duties for two hours a day.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is undoubtedly correct, Mr. President. I think an impartial investigation would divulge the truth.

Tuesday, August 15, 1916.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when the bill was under consideration yesterday evening at the hour of adjournment the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] had propounded a very proper inquiry on the continuance of the appropriations for the new offices created. I had alluded to that subject as an instance of how far from economically and efficiently the Government administered affairs which it assumed to undertake. I was endeavoring to show the reason why the Government ought not to undertake the shipping enterprise by water, which is essentially private in its character. The Senator from Rhode Island inquired how long these increased expenditures would last. Before I had an opportunity to make any definite reply the proceedings began which resulted in the adjournment.

It is proper for me to say that increases in the appropriations are perpetual in character. There are $37,000,000 in round figures made necessary in the appropriations for the three years 1913, 1914, and 1915, because of new offices created. The $37,000,000 is a charge on the Public Treasury perpetually, unless some governmental surgery should be called into operation, an increase of over $13,000,000 over the three preceding years in the appropriations for the new offices created.

Of course it might be said that future sessions of Congress could end these offices, useless or otherwise. That is true. How many offices once created, however, Mr. President, are destroyed? Most of us have had experience in endeavoring to destroy an office after it has once been created. There is nothing that I know of created by human agency endowed with the elements of immortality like a public office. Once created it continues; it is almost impossible to legislate it out of existence. A pay roll has all the elements of the indestructible matter in nature. I do not know of another thing that comes from the human mind that is as indestructible as a pay roll once created.

These departments will be enlarged, these commissions will go on their way, these expenditures will call into existence new pay rolls, with new undertakings. These men are on the pay roll. They adapt themselves to that form of the public service. Immediately, if it is sought to destroy them in future measures presented to Congress, it will be insisted that they are on the pay roll; having served there that they are entitled to consideration. Probably when pension laws come, as they ought, in due course they will become the beneficiaries of a pension system. If the pay roll should be destroyed, necessarily they would lose more or less vested right to participate in a pension in the future.

I know what all those arguments are in smaller areas than are presented to the consideration of Congress. Every time a pay roll has been created under State legislation it requires a superhuman effort, something that rises almost to the requirements of providential help, to ever destroy the pay roll, whether it is useless or otherwise.

So the Senator from Rhode Island is entirely within the bounds of probability when he makes the inquiry, anticipating, as all of us will, what the inevitable is, that it remains not for the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress and for future sessions of this Congress, but it remains for the years to come, especially if the party now in power should continue, for the power that creates the pay roll feels that it must justify that creation, it will endure, and it will persist in the maintenance of that same pay roll.

Since yesterday evening, Mr. President, I have procured the interview of the great Commoner of Nebraska, formerly Secretary of State, on the Vick letter. It is dated at Kansas City, Mo. He is now a private citizen, but he refers to a matter occurring during his official tenure. Mr. Bryan speaks of the letter in an interview. Mr. Bryan challenged the Republican nominee—referring to Mr. Hughes—to state whether he had given appointments to "deserving Republicans" while governor of New York. The statement was made in answer to recent speeches of Hughes which quoted a letter Bryan had written to Receiver of Customs Vick, in Santo Domingo, inquiring as to what positions could be obtained to "reward deserving Democrats." Bryan admitted the letter as it had been quoted.

I desire this to be added so that there may be no question in official circles in the months to come about the validity of this letter written to Mr. Vick. Mr. Bryan continues:

"I am not ashamed of it," the statement read. "The letter was written to an appointive officer, whose office was not under the civil service, and the inquiry was made in regard to officers which were not under the civil service. There was nothing in the letter to indicate a desire or intention to select men who were incompetent. On the contrary, inquiry is made as to 'what is requisite.'"

The only inquiry in the letter is as to whether a knowledge of the Spanish language is necessary.

As an official, I enforced the civil-service law to the letter, and upon my resignation received from the employees in the State Department, more than 90 per cent of whom were under the civil service, a watch which I prize as a priceless treasure. But while I observed the civil-service law wherever it was in force, I felt myself free to aid in rewarding deserving Democrats wherever it could be done without detriment to the service.

Now, I am not complaining about that, Mr. President. What I am complaining about is the somewhat supercilious air implied in the platform of 1912 and comments that the party in power during the preceding administration did not observe properly the civil-service laws of the country. Because of that, I concluded that there must be some very extraordinary method that would be pursued by this administration to take care of the civil-service law, both in letter and in spirit.

My regret is that I was able to reward so few of the multitude who are deserving, measured by their political service, by their capacity, and by their fitness for the work to be done.

The "deserving Democrat" is not to be despised; he is as much entitled to recognition as a "deserving Republican."

I quite agree with the ex-Secretary on that. There could be no proper criticism made. The only criticism I have on this subject is that in the platform of 1912 there was such an unmerciful assault made upon the preceding administration and their application of the civil-service law.

I will not go further on the civil service at this time. I have not at all covered the material which is accessible. There is much of it that must be left unsaid, necessarily. So, without closing our rights for the future, I leave this branch of the discussion for the present, remembering that I only alluded to the civil service in connection with the shipping bill to show that there was no probable ground that the Government could successfully engage in this enterprise. There have been a good many other things——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not understand exactly what the expression "deserving Democrats" and "deserving Republicans" means. Does the Senator understand that Mr. Bryan holds the theory that there are Democrats in this country who deserve employment in the public service and because they deserve it the Government of the United States must employ them? How can any Democrat in the United States deserve employment? Is that the meaning of that phrase? It seems to me like a rather peculiar juxtaposition of words. I understand that the Government employs people who are necessary, not because the individual people deserve employment on the part of the Government. If the Government is going to employ all the deserving people in the United States, I expect it would have to employ some 90 or 95 per cent of them. I do not understand what Mr. Bryan means when he holds out the intimation that people are to be employed by the Government because they are deserving.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt, Mr. President, in response to the Senator's inquiry, that it is more than a mere juxtaposition of words. The words are designed to convey thought and not, as Talleyrand said, to conceal thought. The purpose designed by the use of this language is "deserving Democrats," the ones the letter and this interview refer to, who are useful in rendering political service.

In that sense, if I were an orthodox Democrat, I would say that every Democrat was deserving. I do not say, however, that every Republican is deserving of holding a public position. The public service is to be measured by the necessity of the case, by the requirements of somebody to be on the pay roll to render a needed service, and it would not be necessary to increase by over $37,000,000 inside of three years appropriations for the offices, to add 30,000 new offices, in order arbitrarily to create places for deserving appointees affiliated with a certain political party, whether they were necessary in the public service or not. I think that probably is what the ex-Secretary had in mind, because he says his regret is "that I was able to reward so few in the multitude that are deserving."

I have no doubt that is a purely partisan statement. The letter he wrote was a purely partisan letter. The new offices were purely partisan creations. All of the increases were unnecessary. I believe the whole of the $37,000,000 is money that would as well have been thrown into the sewers of Washington as far as useful service to the Government might be involved.

Mr. WEEKS. I was interested in what the Senator from Illinois said yesterday about the campaign contributions and the amount of contributions made by those who had received Federal appointments. I asked him if he had a complete list of the contributions made to the Democratic campaign committee in 1912, and if so, I would like to examine it. I think it is of public importance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not a complete list. It is only the one that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] made public, which is not a complete list of course.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would be very glad to have a complete examination made. I was just looking at it before I took the floor. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator from Ohio for the purpose of a question. I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course it must occur to a man of the wide experience of the Senator from Illinois that these statements are only of relative importance. Does not the Senator think it would add very greatly to the sum total of human wisdom if, while he is commenting upon the amount of contributions and the number of persons who made contributions for the Democratic national campaign fund and afterwards received offices at the hands of the administration, he would take the pains to give a list of the contributions made to the various Republican campaigns—in the campaign of 1912 and previous thereto—and also to give a list of the contributors who were later rewarded with offices?

Mr. SHERMAN. If I had the list I would be very glad to offer it. In 1912, whoever the contributors were, it so fell out by the fates that nobody was able to be rewarded; there was no appointment possible to be made. I would have no objection to complete publicity. I believe the campaign contributors, all of them, ought to be known to the public. So far as I have had an opportunity to vote upon that question I have always voted that way, either within the State or within Federal jurisdiction, where measures of that kind were pending.

I know at one time there were some passages at arms between a candidate for President and Judge Parker, of New York State, in reference to a contribution. It ended very largely in a draw. I do not for my part undertake to say where the merits of the controversy lay, because before it was well settled the election was over, and since that time my relations with some of the parties to the controversy have not been altogether amicable. But if there is any information on that question and any of the majority Senators would incorporate it in the RECORD I would regard it as a valuable contribution to the political literature of the age.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will put into the RECORD the names of the contributors to whom reference has been made. I hope at the same time he will use every diligence, or that some Democratic Senator will do so, to obtain a list of the contributions which were made in the campaign of 1912, and let that be given the same kind of publicity. I should like to see them published.

Mr. POMERENE. Why does the Senator from Massachusetts except from that proposition the list of contributors to the Roosevelt fund?

Mr. WEEKS. That is a dead issue.

Mr. POMERENE. Since when did it die?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad to have a complete list.

Mr. POMERENE. We should like to know who delivered "the blow that killed father."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator from Illinois puts the list which he has into the RECORD—I believe that is now the proposition—I should like to be informed, if I can, on what this list is based in the way of information. Is it based on any record or is it a mere guess, or what is the information which the Senator has as to the accuracy or the correctness of the list; how it originated; and from what source it is obtained? If the Senator could give us that information, I could understand whether or not to object to its going into the RECORD. Otherwise I shall be unable to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not undertake to offer any testimony as to the accuracy of the report, but shall content myself by asking permission from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to incorporate the list at the conclusion of my remarks and to print it at length. Then, if any of the gentlemen who are wrongfully accused, desire to exonerate themselves, they can do so individually from time to time; but the list comes to me under such conditions that I am disposed to regard it as having a credible source. It is possible there may be inaccuracies in it, but, upon the whole, I am inclined to think it is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Senator from Illinois has no knowledge as to the origin of the list or how the information was obtained, but simply tenders it; and if it is wrong, anybody can correct it who desires to do so, without attempting to say that he has reason to believe that the list is correct, as I understand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I would be very loath to deprive anybody around Democratic national campaign headquarters of a position on the party pay roll. I do not know whether there are at present any of those gentlemen engaged in the service or not, and until I have that duly verified, I would only let the matter rest where it now is. I am unable to say more definitely. I ask that the list be printed entire at the close of my remarks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not interrupt the Senator from Illinois further than to suggest that, if he desires to pursue the inquiry in that direction, I should be glad if some day he would furnish us with a list of the Republican officeholders of the present administration and those in the foreign service, the chiefs of bureaus, and others, who are in the various departments of the Government here in Washington.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask for the list; and before I conclude my remarks, I shall ask leave to have it printed at length, accompanying it with the statement, of course, that I have already made, that I believe it to be an accurate account.

If we are to sell the ships which are purchased by this board and leased or operated within the five-year period, it will require considerable business ability for the Government to recover itself.

For my part, I do not know whether or not the Government can get a portion of the $50,000,000 out. That is an open question which depends a great deal on whether or not the Government has a proper uniform business procedure that will permit value to be realized from the shipping that is in operation at the time of the expiration of the five years, which would be, to be accurate, five years from the close of the present European war. If the authority mentioned in the bill—the shipping board, which is appointed by the President—is not more uniform, is not more businesslike and definite in its beliefs than has been the present administration, I am disposed to think that the $50,000,000 would be a total loss. When the five-year period shall have elapsed the entire merchant shipping that would be acquired under the board would be mere junk.

I have reasons for thinking so. For instance, the Executive of the present administration dominates the party, whether it be on a child-labor bill or on anything else. It was proposed to so conduct the caucus that somebody might rush to the rescue, and the President was ready. It does not make any difference what some of the Senators from certain States think—and immediately the child-labor bill is urged after it was not taken up by a political caucus. This enabled the President to appear as its savior.

I am disposed to think I have some proof why I am right in thinking that there is some uncertainty and vacillation in the present head of the administration, and that the same vacillation and uncertainty would manifest itself in the management of a shipping bill and the consequent business enterprise resulting from that undertaking.

For instance, I have a letter, dated February 5, 1913, written by the President to A. Mitchell Palmer, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania. I shall not undertake to read all of this letter, but shall read only certain passages which lend some support to the statement I have made. It is in regard to a second presidential term. He was referring to a plank in the platform of 1912. He had been elected in the preceding November, and on the 5th day of February, 1913, he wrote this letter to Mr. Palmer. It contains the following language:

> I have not hitherto said anything about this question, because I had not observed that there was any evidence that the public was very much interested in it. I must have been mistaken in this, else the Senate would hardly have acted so promptly upon it.

It seems that the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] had called up the second-term joint resolution, and that some action had been taken on it to which the then President elect's attention was called. He continues:

> I can approach the question from a perfectly impersonal point of view, because I shall most cheerfully abide by the judgment of my party and the public as to whether I shall be a candidate for the Presidency again in 1916. I absolutely pledge myself to resort to nothing but public opinion to decide that question.

The platform plank in 1912 declared in favor of a constitutional amendment prohibiting the President from again serving a succeeding term. It is known here as the second-term plank. Leaving that plank, leaving its pledge, and all that was implied in the campaign, he says he approaches it from an impersonal point of view and will cheerfully abide by the judgment of his party. Well, it is a party pledge, and is probably destined to suffer the same fate as other Democratic Party pledges of 1912. He continues:

> To change the term to six years would be to increase the likelihood of its being too long, without any assurance that it would, in happy cases, be long enough. A fixed constitutional limitation to a single term of office is highly arbitrary and unsatisfactory from every point of view. * * * It is their illicit power, not their legitimate influence with the country, that the advocates of a constitutional change profess to be afraid of, and I heartily sympathize with them. It is intolerable that any President should be permitted to determine who should succeed him—himself or another—by patronage or coercion or by any sort of control of the machinery by which delegates to the nominating convention are chosen.

Here is another matter, and it is of some concern, because we realize that the nominations have a great deal to do with the subsequent elections and processes, and the party machinery or arrangements by which nominations are made necessarily are vital and connect themselves with the Government in such a way that the legislatures of most of the States and the Supreme Court have decided that the primary laws are a proper exercise of the legislative power on a vital question of that kind. So it seems to me that there is some further evidence of the fitness of this administration to engage in a private enterprise requiring the initial expenditure of $50,000,000. He continues:

There ought never to be another presidential nominating convention—and there need never be another. Several of the States have successfully solved that difficulty with regard to the choice of their governors, and Federal law can solve it in the same way with regard to the choice of Presidents. The nomination should be made directly by the people at the polls.

This was written in February, 1913—

Conventions should determine nothing but party platforms and should be made up of the men who would be expected, if elected, to carry those platforms into effect. It is not necessary to attend to the people's business by constitutional amendment if you will only actually put the business into the people's own hands.

I think it may safely be assumed that that will be done within the next four years; for it can be done by statute; it need not wait for constitutional change. That being done, the question of the presidential term can be discussed on its merits.

I omit a great part of this letter, which is almost as long as the longest chapter in "The New Freedom or "Congressional Government."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois inform me from what letter he is reading? I was called out of the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a letter written February 5, 1913, and addressed to A. Mitchell Palmer on the second term, refining and explaining away the pledge of the platform of 1912. It was written by the now President of the United States to Representative Palmer of the Senator's State at that time. The President continues:

I believe that we should fatally embarrass ourselves if we made the constitutional change proposed. If we want our Presidents to fight our battles for us, we should give them the means, the legitimate means, the means their opponents will always have. Strip them of everything else but the right to appeal to the people, but leave them that; suffer them to be leaders; absolutely prevent them from being bosses.

I will forbear, out of consideration for many friends of mine on the majority side of the Chamber, to ask if there are any political bosses in this administration. It would not be well to pursue the inquiry.

I am very well aware that my position on this question will be misconstrued, but that is a matter of perfect indifference to me. * * * I am not speaking for my own reelection; I am speaking to redeem my promise that I would say what I really think on every public question and take my chances in the court of public opinion.

And so on.

At the end of my remarks I ask leave, Mr. President, to incorporate this letter in its entirety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection; and it is so ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. In regard, then, to primary legislation, this letter is very enlightening.

In addition to that, I have a further extract from the President's message, I think, of December, 1914. He refers in that message to the necessity of presidential primary legislation. "It will enable," he says, "Presidents to be nominated by a direct primary. It will abolish future national conventions." That is in a paragraph in a message delivered to Congress.

In that he says that in the future nominations by convention ought never to be permitted; that nominations ought to be made directly by the people. Outside of the letter to Mr. Palmer and outside of the reference to it in a single message to Congress, who has heard of that since? When it came to practical legislation initiated in either branch of Congress, no action was taken. Since that time there has been impenetrable silence, and nothing has been heard of it and nothing will be heard of it, even if Mr. Wilson should be reelected.

He declared that all future conventions should be made up of the candidates who had been chosen on the respective tickets. Those who had been nominated for seats in the House of Representatives and in the Senate and those who were nominated for other offices were to be delegates to political conventions, to sit only as an advisory body and to write a platform designed to carry out the will of the common people, who had expressed themselves in the preceding primaries.

I do not care to take any great length of time on the primary question, because I wish to place other matters that are of more importance where they will be readily accessible; but I proceed to another matter which my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] very fully covered during some remarks that he made some days since in this body. I wish to read a plank from the Democratic platform of 1912:

The constitutional rights of American citizens should protect them on our borders and go with them throughout the world, and every American citizen residing or having property in any foreign country is entitled to and must be given the full protection of the United States Government, both for himself and his property.

I desire now to read a plank from the Democratic platform of 1916:

The American Government should protect American citizens in their rights, not only at home but abroad, and any country having a government should be held to strict accountability for any wrongs done them, either to person or to property.

I wish to read another plank of the same platform of 1916:

The want of a stable, responsible government in Mexico capable of repressing and punishing marauders and bandit bands who have not only taken the lives and seized and destroyed the property of American citizens in that country, but have insolently invaded our soil, made war upon and murdered our people thereon, has rendered it necessary temporarily to occupy by our armed forces a portion of the territory of that friendly State.

On October 19, 1915, the following document was directed by our State Department in Washington to the representative of Carranza at this Capital:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 19, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. ARREDONDO: It is my pleasure to inform you that the President of the United States takes this opportunity of extending recognition to the de facto Government of Mexico, of which Gen. Venustiano Carranza is the chief executive.

The Government of the United States will be pleased to receive formally in Washington a diplomatic representative of the de facto Government as soon as it shall please Gen. Carranza to designate and appoint such representative; and, reciprocally, the Government of the United States will accredit to the de facto Government a diplomatic representative as soon as the President has had opportunity to designate such representative.

I should appreciate it if you could find it possible to communicate this information to Gen. Carranza at your earliest convenience.

Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

I read the extracts from the Democratic platform, together with this document from the Department of State, in view of the conclusion that I wish to draw, keeping in mind that the plank first read from the platform of 1916 says that—

The American Government should protect American citizens in their rights not only at home but abroad, and any country having a government should be held to strict accountability.

Very well, confine it to "any country having a government." On October 19, 1915, by the acknowledgment of the de facto Government of Mexico it was officially stated by our Government that there was a government in Mexico, a government which was worthy of recognition, and that properly accredited diplomatic representatives would be recognized reciprocally. Therefore Mexico has a government according to the judgment of the Chief Executive, or his Secretary of State, acting under what we will assume is his direction.

Immediately after this recognition there came a distressing silence; there was nothing for months except occasional massacres, occasional disturbances, individual in character, ranch owners murdered, their property taken, their families dispersed. Then last March another incident happened. The subsequent events are very familiar, and I will not take time to recount them.

It is sufficient to say that from last October, when our Government recognized the de facto Government of Mexico, within the time when the plank of their platform was written at St. Louis last June, there has been a government in Mexico, at least by the official acknowledgment of this administration.

What kind of a government has it been? Has it been sufficient for the ordinary purposes of protecting aliens, their persons, and property within the borders of the de facto government? Has it been a sufficient government to discharge its international obligations?

Let me read from another document as to the ability of the present administration to discharge our international duty and as to its ability to take care of its domestic affairs. If it can not discharge its duty in Mexico, how can it discharge its duty in so simple and comparatively unimportant a matter as the shipping bill?

I read now from the note of June 20, 1916, of Secretary Lansing, generalizing the conditions that have existed since the recognition of the de facto government on October 19, 1915:

The Government of the United States has viewed with deep concern and increasing disappointment the progress of the revolution in Mexico. Continuous bloodshed and disorders have marked its progress. For three years the Mexican Republic has been torn with civil strife; the lives of Americans and other aliens have been sacrificed; vast properties developed by American capital and enterprise have been destroyed or rendered nonproductive; bandits have been permitted to roam at will through the territory contiguous to the United States, and to seize, without punishment or without effective attempts at punishment, the property of Americans, while the lives of citizens of the United States who ventured to remain in Mexican territory or to return there to protect their interests have been taken, in some cases barbarously taken, and the murderers have neither been apprehended nor brought to justice.

It would be difficult to find in the annals of the history of Mexico conditions more deplorable than those which have existed there during these recent years of civil war.

It would be tedious to recount instance after instance, outrage after outrage, atrocity after atrocity, to illustrate the true nature and extent of the widespread conditions of lawlessness and violence which have prevailed during the last nine months.

And if you run back from the 20th of June nine months you get back to about the time when recognition was accorded the de facto Government of Mexico—in the particular, the frontier of the United States along the lower Rio Grande has been thrown into a state of constant apprehension and turmoil because of frequent and sudden incursions into American territory and depredations and murders on American soil by Mexican bandits, who have taken the lives and destroyed the property of American citizens, sometimes carrying American citizens across the international boundary with the booty seized.

This is the record made. On it in the November election we are entitled to the verdict of the American people. "If a country has a government, it will be held to strict accountability." What kind of accountability so far has been demanded of any of those connected with the de facto government or otherwise?

A certain event occurred in March, 1916. Into a municipality in New Mexico an incursion was made by a lawless leader of still more lawless men from across the Mexican border. Some lives were taken, some property destroyed, and a reign of terror temporarily was inaugurated where this disaster occurred. From what source did it come? It came from Mexico. Where did the bandits gather? Where were their rendezvous and their refuge when they fled? Mexico. Who was the de facto government? Carranza. When was he recognized? On the 19th day of October, 1915. Is that de facto government a fit instrument to discharge international obligations as between Mexico and this Republic or any other Government?

Let me read what Carranza said after the murder of Benton, the Englishman. I need but to mention his name. Our memories are sufficiently fresh as to that incident to make comment unnecessary. When it was suggested by the British Government that we act in its behalf in order to discover under what conditions Benton was killed, Gen. Carranza, in his tropical dignity, made the following remarks:

My dignity as chief of the revolution compels me to refuse to recognize the right of the United States to act as the agent of Great Britain in looking after the interests of Great Britain in the Benton case. The British Government must come to me directly.

That was in March, 1914.

At one time, Mr. President, in this Chamber a roll call was had. I thought in all human probability that some reasonable means toward ending an intolerable condition were approaching. In fact, a portion of our Navy had been ordered into Mexican waters. On the roll call I voted to grant the power the President had asked, and I would be glad to do so again in the same circumstances. The order dispatching the Navy, so far as I have accurate information, was made before Congress was ever asked to act. All that we were asked to do was to approve the action already taken by the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of our country. We went to that port.

At that time there was a de facto government in Mexico. It had been recognized by Great Britain, by France, by Russia, and by Japan. Huerta had a de facto government which discharged its international obligations sufficiently to receive that recognition from the powers I have named. For some reason it was said that in his abstract of title to the throne there was some defect, some moral taint attached in such a way that the then incoming President had decided, and after he was inaugurated proceeded to carry out his decision, to refuse recognition to that de facto government or its head because he had some question as to how the right to exercise the powers of that government had been acquired.

So, first, an embargo was put on war supplies; then it was taken off; then it was put on as to certain ports. All northern Mexico could be supplied through her ports, from Tampico and neighboring ports down along Lower California and the State of Sonora. It was possible from the Pacific coast side to supply northern Mexico with munitions of war. So, while the land traffic was ended, it was permitted that war supplies be introduced through Mexican ports, enumerating certain ports, the principal ones of which I have named.

What was the purpose, ostensibly? I need not go into the details. I remember very well in this Chamber the vote that was taken on that resolution. It came over from the House. There was but little opposition expressed to it, except that on the roll call a number of Senators felt constrained to vote against it. The purpose was to vindicate the dignity of this country, to extort respect for the flag by force of arms. It was for the purpose, it was said, of teaching those who had outraged our national sense of honor to respect our colors. Some of our men were killed; a considerable number of Mexicans were killed in Vera Cruz.

The ship that was laden with munitions which it was desired to stop, that came from a German port, sailing under German colors, was not allowed to land its war supplies at Vera Cruz.

But after a little slaughter, after some spilling of blood on both sides, the ships of our Navy weighed anchor and returned. They did not even stay at Tampico, where many Americans and other refugees, aliens in that country, had gathered for the purpose of fleeing the country, following the advice of the President in a former message to all Americans at least to get up and leave the country, that it was unsafe to remain there. It was reserved for alien vessels, for the English, and other powers having shipping in that port, to take our own citizens to a place of safety after our own naval expedition had been withdrawn from the marginal waters of Mexico and abandoned them to their fate. They would not even stay out on the high seas, beyond the territorial line, where the refugees could be delivered to our vessels. They returned to our own waters, and left our own citizens to be rescued by aliens. The munitions of war were subsequently landed at another port, and nothing resulted but the loss of life.

We are charged with being responsible for the massacres in Mexico. Mr. President, I read from the address of my colleague, for whom I have the greatest respect:

Mr. President, then we have it that the very officers of the administration who were in Mexico, the agents of commerce, the consuls of the United States, who were best informed and best constituted to be informed, gave to President Wilson and his Secretary of State their judgment that Villa at the time represented the abilities best calculated to bring forth order and establish peace in Mexico. Villa's platform and performances sounded as of the virtue of American doctrines—liberty for the humble, justice for the poor, right and equity for mankind, the lands as homes for the people and not as the private possessions of landed princes.

And let it be remembered that so powerful was that force of Villa that against the army of Porfirio Diaz and the best forces he could command in Mexico at the time of his greatest power Villa was able for years to hold his army in opposition and to oppose successfully the conquering of him or his cause by Diaz. This notwithstanding the combined power of all that Diaz could collect in the way of soldiers and money. Was it not natural that President Wilson could conceive from these evidences that this commander had power as represented? The effort was honestly made by the President. Every encouragement that could be given without the violation of our duty was afforded. The object of the United States was to keep the hands of power off of Mexico; let it work out its own destiny through the agencies of its own creation, as was the process of the government of republics. Villa was not acquiesced in by all of Mexico. He was opposed in his own land. Frustrated by those whose assumption of control he sought to dispute, and which he claimed had for its object the robbing of the poor, for whom he spoke, the ruling classes of Mexico and certain business interests all combined against him—under what righteous claim I know not. But this I do know, that had the leaders of the Republican Party in Congress given to the Democratic President support in this foreign policy and announced that as the President had recognized Villa as a test and trial to bring forth through him order, and had they demanded united obedience in America to this effort of the President as one from the highest authority and from the only authority that was vested with privilege of deciding the question, there would have been a different result from what ensued.

Beginning from the day of inauguaration, March 4, 1913, the President has neither intervened effectively in Mexico nor has he let it alone. He has refused to intervene to produce peace and stability or a government adequate to the protection of person and property. He has been present in Mexico for mischief and absent for useful service. He has interfered enough to create the greatest of prejudice against the unfortunate few Americans who are unable to flee from that country.

Here is the admission. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] said that the admission that Villa was contemplated once for recognition as the de facto head of the Government was a blow at a vital spot. It is so. I read some additional evidence that will corroborate what my colleague stated and admitted in his very able address not long ago. It is dated May 22, 1916:

The decided support given at one time to Villa by Gen. Scott and the Department of State itself was the principal cause for the prolongation of civil war in Mexico during many months.

AGUILAR, Secretary.

That is to say, Secretary of State of the de facto government of Carranza.

There is corroborative evidence of what this administration was engaged in during a portion of the time the Senate, so far at least as the minority side was concerned, had no information.

I wish to add this, not because it is new, but because it needs to be added here in the regular sequence of events: When it comes to the moral character of the man to be recognized as the head of a de facto government, as between Huerta and Villa, it must be said at least Huerta maintained a government. If it had not been for the interference of this Government he would have been in power, in all probability, and would have quelled the civil discord in that country. An embargo was laid upon supplies. No money could be borrowed. He could issue and sell no bonds. He could not equip and pay his army. He could obtain no recognition adequate to procure the means to wage war against those in insurrection against his authority, and so he abdicated and left the country. Then the negotiations began, almost immediately upon his abdication, to recognize Villa upon moral grounds, because Huerta, it was said, had something to do with the assassination of Madero. A moral gentleman was selected as his successor.

I have been about the border a good deal in my time, and far down below the border several times within the last 25 years. I know the Indian somewhat—not like those who live there, or who have spent many years of their lives in that country. I heard of Villa some years ago, before he was known to modern fame. Here is his biography. If I were searching for the head of a de facto government, for the director of a gymnasium, or of a Young Men's Christian Association, I would pass to some other more promising subject.

Francisco Villa, born at Las Nieves, in the State of Durango, 1868. 1882 sentenced to term of imprisonment for cattle rustling.

That is a polite term, you know, in the cow country. We would call it just plain cattle stealing up in our country.

On his discharge, settled in the mining camp of Guanacevi, where a few months after he received another sentence of imprisonment for killing.

That is an amicable sort of an offense. It might be true. They only jail a man a while for it there.

On discharge from the second sentence, he organized a band of robbers, which had headquarters in the mountainous regions of Perico, in the State of Durango, where they were the terror of the district.

1907. In partnership with Francisco Reza, stealing cattle in Chihuahua and selling them in the United States, and then stealing horses and mules in the United States and selling them in Chihuahua.

That is a new form of reciprocity, Mr. President.

In a disagreement with his partner, Reza, he shot and killed him on the plaza in the city of Chihuahua.

In November, 1910, he killed Mr. Soto in his factory in Allende. The latter's daughter was forced to show where she had hidden $11,000 of her father's. This Villa stole.

In January, 1911, at Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, he killed Carlos Alatora and Lewis Ortiz for refusing to pay money for ransom.

In February, 1911, at Batopilas, Chihuahua, he tortured Senora Gomez until he extorted from her $30,000. She afterwards died from her injuries.

In November, 1911, he obtained a monopoly for the sale of meat in the city of Chihuahua, which he supplied by stealing cattle from the neighboring farms. In the latter part of November he killed one of his subordinates, Juarez, for stealing on his own account.

It is all right to steal yourself, but do not permit any subordinate to steal.

So long as we are going to investigate the packing industry of this country, we might as well investigate Villa, and find out how he conducted the packing business during a part of this time I am talking about.

In May, 1913, with 75 men, at Paeza, State of Chihuahua, he robbed a railway train of $100,000, killing several of the crew and passengers.

I will not read the rest of these items that I have collected. Some of them are incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of a year and a half ago. Some of them I have collected from various prints, from the border or across the line, during the last two and a half years. It is enough to say that this gentleman, to be as euphonious as possible, under a competitive civil-service examination of this administration, probably would have showed no clearer record to a place in authority than the gentleman who proceded him—and so Huerta was expelled.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, under this administration the President probably would have issued an Executive order exempting the place from the civil service, and would have appointed Villa.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it. A man who has the ability to survive during all these years, uncaptured, with a portion of the Regular Army of the United States in pursuit of him, and yet is able to evade pursuit and still to live, ought to possess the elements of durability and ability together that would render him a fit subject for a Democratic Executive order—no doubt of it.

There are complaints made now that Americans do not operate their property. It is said at once: "Americans went into Mexico for the purpose of making money." What is meant by these sentiments in the planks I have read when they extended the protection of this Government, in 1912, around the world to American citizens and their property? Is it worth while to consider anybody's property? Why in 1916 is it said that when a country has a government adequate to the protection of person and property it shall be held to strict accountability? I take it that primarily government is charged with the protection of persons; that personal rights take precedence of everything else; and that secondary to those rights the rights of property, that supplement and make tolerable conditions of modern life, are a proper subject for governmental protection, either at home or abroad. Still, out of the many hundreds of millions of dollars that have been taken to Mexico, every person who makes complaint is accused of being guilty of greedy commercialism. It is said: "You went into that country and took your chances, and we will do nothing for you now."

On the 27th of August, 1913, the President, in a message, said:

We must let everyone who assumes to exercise authority in any part of Mexico know, in the most unequivocal way, that we shall vigilantly watch the fortunes of those Americans who can not get away, and shall hold those responsible for their suffering and losses to a definite reckoning.

Nothing has been done up to this time. I anticipate that nothing is likely ever to be done, so far as this administration is depended upon.

Here is a dispatch from Chihuahua—a press report:

Charges are circulated, even in official circles, that American mining and other concerns with properties in Mexico are refusing to operate in order to help bring about intervention, it was learned to-day.

With plenty of work and food, de facto government officials say, the prevalent tendency of the poorer classes to turn to banditry would disappear.

It is said that resumption of work at the various mining camps could be accomplished without danger, as only small bandit groups are now in existence, while large garrisons are available for all properties.

The population of Chihuahua must live on imports for the next three months. The State has but little arable land, and in the best of times imports largely. Since the rainy season set in, dysentery and rheumatism are prevalent in the city.

Villa has got neither of them. He seems to be able to keep well in advance of both the de facto troops and the regular troops of the United States.

The day following is this press report:

Mexican outlaws last week looted an American-owned mine at El Cajon, in the Altar district of Sonora, and killed two Chinese cooks, according to advices received here to-day.

Arrivals from Mexico City to-day confirm reports of the interruption of almost every line of industry there, and say that thousands of peons are on the verge of starvation. Zapata rebels, they say, are gradually occupying the federal district near the capital.

And still we are criticized because the owners of American property do not go into those remote fastnesses, where there is no government adequate for the protection of persons or property, and operate their mines or other business enterprises!

The troops went below the line in pursuit of the bandits. The matters that led up to it and followed were incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], and I only refer to them to make a connected story of what I am saying on this subject. Here is the return after Carrizal:

It is said that we have been kept out of war. We have been in war at Vera Cruz. Navies do not engage in expeditions against individuals. A military force of this Government does not pursue anybody across the line into a foreign country and there engage in battle with the military forces of the de facto government and still make it possible to say we have been at peace.

On the 16th day of last July, at Laredo, Tex., two Mexicans were indicted and placed on trial, charged with robbery and murder under the laws of the State of Texas. Another one lay badly wounded in the hospital at that place. What was their defense? I have their defense in my office. It sets up a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. It announces that one of them was a captain in the Carranza army, that another was a lieutenant, and in their pockets were found the commissions signed by Gen. Nafarata, who was operating in northern Mexico as an authorized general and a commander in the military forces of Carranza. They were caught redhanded across the border, incarcerated in a common jail, indicted by the ordinary criminal processes of a Texas court, placed upon trial, and set up that they were guilty of none of the offenses charged in the indictment, because they were regular officers in charge of a military force acting in behalf of the constitutionalist Government of Mexico, and that the acts they committed were justifiable acts committed in battle with an enemy of their country. That is their plea. Still we are not at war.

After a time, when at Carrizal we were made responsible, according to the theory of some of my friends in this Chamber, for all that had occurred up to that time and before, the loss of life being put upon those who criticize the administration—after all that is done a few of the men who were prisoners in Chihuahua, incarcerated like felons, who went there wearing the uniform of the United States and pursuant to orders issued by the War Department in this Capital, came back to the border. They arrived at the old wooden bridge that reaches from El Paso, Tex., across to Juarez, where they were to be delivered to the military authorities of the United States—those of them that survived the machine guns at Carrizal.

Here is what happened, and the press reports were almost uniform on that morning:

EL PASO, TEX., June 29.

Twenty-three negro troopers of the Tenth Cavalary and Lem Spillsbury, Mormon scout, captured by the Mexicans at Carrizal and confined in the Chihuahua penitentiary, were brought to the border at noon to-day and turned over to American military authorities.

Here is the part that I wish the American people to pass on at the earliest opportunity. These are soldiers, dispatched under an order of the Commander in Chief to pursue an ordinary land robber, murderer, and thief into a country that has no adequate government for the protection of life and property. They are met by the assumed government that has been recognized, engaged in battle, and a portion of them killed and the remainder of them captured; afterwards those prisoners of war are turned over, at the point named, to the military authorities of our country.

At the time this formality occurred all of the press dispatches bear testimony to this fact:

A shout of laughter rose from the thousands of Mexicans who had gathered to witness the arrival as the negroes filed from the special train. The prisoners were dressed in the scantiest and most nondescript garb. Some had on only trousers. One wore a shirt, while a towel encircled his waist. Others' heads were decorated with bandannas. All the troopers were worn and drawn from their experience, and all were serious save one, who wore a broad smile.

This one negro made himself the impromptu spokesman for his fellows.

"We are sure glad to get back," he said.

And with that the curtain fell, and the prisoners of war that survived the slaughter at Carrizal made their entrée into the United States under their own colors, with their lives intact, but leaving their uniforms and their wardrobes on the other side. Those soldiers were citizens of our country, soldiers of the Republic. They were negroes but brave men who obeyed orders. What a humiliating spectacle.

Are we responsible? Shall we be held to bear this indignity and dishonor? Will it be approved?

I have uniformly voted, Mr. President, in this Chamber, to sustain the President's authority, to lend strength to his arm. I have announced repeatedly, and I have voted repeatedly, to give him on land and sea such necessary forces as will protect the dignity and the power of this Government abroad, and will protect our citizens in Mexico or elsewhere.

I absolve myself from any blame. I repudiate and denounce the suggestion that any Republican in this Chamber or elsewhere is responsible for any of the disasters that followed in the train of "watchful waiting," and the vacillating, undecided, and the almost imbecile weakness that has characterized this administration in its course with Mexico.

What happened during all these years? Secular property has been taken by the spoiler. The cathedrals of three centuries have been demolished, the priceless works of art destroyed. The Rubenses and the Van Dykes, the immortal canvases that have been gathered in the cloisters of the chapels of old Mexico have been destroyed. The altars have been profaned. The shrines have been desecrated. An ancient priesthood has been outraged. The Sisters of Charity have been subjected to unnamable treatment. The holy precincts of an ancient church have been made the scenes of revelry and riot, where drunken harlots, upon the cavalry horses of a still more drunken and dissolute banditti, have outraged every sentiment of the Christian heart and the Christian religion or the reverence that rises in the spirit of every race and every creed in the civilized world.

That has been wrought in the name of nonintervention and that Mexicans are "entitled to spill as much of their blood as they wish," and to decide what form of government they desire. I have no objection to their spilling their own blood, but I do object to their spilling the blood of aliens.

All this has happened while we were waiting for some more moral gentlemen to appear who might be recognized. Villa first comes upon the scene, and later Carranza moves on the bloody stage, and the end of this hideous drama no one knows.

In Indianapolis, on the 8th day of January, 1915, the President delivered an address. It was on Jackson Day, a most auspicious occasion, celebrating the greatest victory of one of the patron saints of Democracy, that at New Orleans. He used this language:

I hold it as a fundamental principle, and so do you, that every people has the right to determine its own form of government; and until this recent revolution in Mexico, until the end of the Diaz reign, 80 per cent of the people of Mexico never had a "look-in" in determining who should be their governor or what their government should be. Now, I am for the 80 per cent. It is none of my business, and it is none of your business, how long they take in determining it. It is none of my business, and it is none of yours, how they go about the business. The country is theirs. The government is theirs. The liberty, if they can get it, and Godspeed them in getting it, is theirs. And so far as my influence goes while I am President nobody shall interfere with them.

SYMPATHY TOWARD MEXICO.

That is what I mean by a great emotion, the great emotion of sympathy. Do you suppose that the American people are ever going to count a small amount of material benefit and advantage to people doing business in Mexico against the liberties and the permanent happiness of the Mexican people? Have not European nations taken as long as they wanted and spilt as much blood as they pleased in settling their affairs, and shall we deny that to Mexico because she is weak? No, I say! I am proud to belong to a strong nation that says: "This country, which we could crush, shall have just as much freedom in her own affairs as we have."

Very well; it has gone on in that way, and he has assumed to recognize a de facto government, and it is now unable to fulfill its obligations either to our own people or to anybody else. So I assume that before we engage in any other undertaking it would be as well for us to finish properly the ones that have now devolved on us that will take all our effort, our time, and what money we can properly spend.

I will not go further into the Mexican question, because I do not wish at this time to take more time.

I wish to put in as a part of my remarks here an editorial from the Legislative Labor News, the organ of the National Federation of Labor, published when Mr. Hughes left Albany for the Supreme Court. I will read the editorial from the Labor News:

Now that Gov. Hughes has retired from politics and ascended to a place on the highest judicial tribunal in the world, the fact can be acknowledged without hurting anybody's political corns that he was the greatest friend of labor laws that ever occupied the governor's chair at Albany. During his two terms he has signed 56 labor laws, including among them the best labor laws ever enacted in this or any State.

He also urged the enactment of labor laws in his messages to the legislature, even going so far as to place the demand for a labor law in one of his messages to an extra session of the legislature.

Only 162 labor laws have been enacted in this State since its erection in 1777—in 133 years. One-third of these, exceeding in quality all of the others, have been enacted and signed during Gov. Hughes's term of three years and nine months.

Now, Mr. President, I have no desire to take much further time on this question. The revenue bill will be coming on at a proper interval, and with the indulgence of the Senate when that measure is before this body I have some comments to submit upon that question. If you will let me levy the taxes of the country and collect the money I do not care who else governs the country; ultimately I bring everybody else to an acceptance of the views embodied in my legislation.

Everything that will be said here after the tumult and the shouting have died away, after the appropriations are made, after everything has been done, after even the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has risen in a stately way and at a proper interval and delivered his denunciations with dignity, decorum, and withering scorn—after all that is done, when we begin to foot the bill, then we begin to pay, as I suggested yesterday, for the appropriation fiddler's music that we have had furnished us during all this session, beginning last December.

Some place we must raise the money. Some place these appropriations must tax unremittingly and unceasingly, the money, the income, the property, and the business resources from all the possessions of the people of this country who are engaged in private enterprise. Finally it must be paid by the people who have means, paying in proportion as we have, except as to the income tax, and there we pay in proportion to our ability to pay, not what we have, because we exempt three or four thousand dollars, as the case may be.

So at last when we come to consider the revenue bill it will be the real test of whether this administration successfully can govern the country, make such appropriations, and levy taxes in such a way as to receive the indorsement of the majority of the voters of this country. That will be the test.

I have no doubt that that matter will be before us in due time for complete discussion here. I wish to say that I shall desire some little time on that question.

It was suggested here that undoubtedly people would not be visited with any evil effect if they failed to abide by the conference or caucus. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] denounced those who on the shipping bill a year or so ago did not abide by a Democratic caucus. I remember when a certain member of the legislature was about to die in Kentucky, he stood in the aisle and said he was one who had bolted a caucus of his party and the stings of his conscience had pursued him from that time until he would pass across the Great Divide.

I have gotten used to hearing the Senator from Missouri. I always enjoy his comments. It does not make any difference whom he hits. If a cobblestone comes in my way once in a while I enjoy it just as much as anybody else who gets hit with another. He is entirely impartial. Once in a while he turns on his own colleagues; he chides them with more or less vigor for making campaign speeches.

I remember when a gentleman on the other side of the Chamber made a campaign speech that if I were a Democrat I would say was a good speech, both from the standpoint of the campaign and the standpoint of the constructive or critical statesmanship. The day before the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had delivered a speech on the propriety of a Supreme Court Justice resigning and becoming a candidate for a partisan office.

The Senator from Missouri took occasion, as I remember, to inflict impartial punishment upon both sides of the Chamber in his remarks. He said that the boys in the press gallery understood it—"the dogs were barking." Two days afterwards he came out of his kennel and barked louder and longer himself than anybody else. I do not know, when he referred to the dogs as barking, whether he had reference to our conduct or what it was. Anyhow, he used the phrase "the dogs were barking," and since that time he has barked more than anybody else.

So ever so often when he comes in this Chamber and walks down the aisle in gloomy, solitary grandeur, with a frown on his face, shrouded in impenetrable mystery, and the weight of empire bowing his regal form, I can see that something has happened, or is about to. He is like Cæsar when he came into the senate chamber of old. I know at once what is going to happen to you brethren on the other side of the aisle or here. As the immortal bard of Avon said:

> But, look you, Cassius,
> The angry spot doth glow on Cæsar's brow,
> And all the rest look like a chidden train.
> Calpurnia's cheek is pale; and Cicero
> Looks with such ferret and such fiery eyes
> As we have seen him in the capitol,
> Being cross'd in conference by some senators.

A conference is held—a Democratic caucus—and when the Senator from Missouri comes in here with the angry spot glowing on his brow I know it bodes some strange eruption to the State. He has been crossed in the conference of Democratic Senators; something that morning will break loose; and at least one dog will bark and will bark lustily before adjournment is had.

I like it. He is a picture of superb and attractive action when he has upon him the divine spirit of vociferous criticism. I can think of nothing but Holy Writ when I see him marching down the aisle in full action fighting and fuming, effulgent as a comet wandering through space, full of eloquence and shedding language that is a shame to the memory of Worcester or Webster.

On such occasions, Mr. President, his neck is clothed with the thunder, "the glory of his nostrils is terrible."

> He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men.
> He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword.
> The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield.
> He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage; neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.
> He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

I know, then, that we are receiving some of the criticism that we have earned. I know, then, at least that there will be a brief period when everybody may sit about and rejoice in the fullness of the eloquence and in the exuberant diction and in the tremendous energy that the Committee on Foreign Relations always expect of the statesman who is at the head of that body. I know he is bursting with suppressed information. He seems to exude, "If only I could tell you of the things I know, it would make every hair 'stand on end like quills upon the fretful porcupine.' Ah, but I must not speak what I know," seems to say the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. "When I open my mouth let no dog bark." So everybody, all the chidden train on both sides, sit down and give him plenty of room and fresh air for the exercise of his talent.

I shall not ask for further time from the Senate except to add in a concluding paragraph that the Senator from Missouri had a good deal to do with writing the present 1916 platform. He was the keynote sounder, it seems. I ask him why he did not sound a declaration favoring free tolls through the Panama Canal; why he did not sound a denunciation of the profligate waste of public funds; why he did not sound another stalwart pledge, as in 1912, of economy in future operation; why no promise of constitutional action regarding the presidential term limited to one; why no denunciation of the principle of protection; no assertion that protection is unconstitutional? There was nothing of that kind, although it has been in a Democratic platform ever since I can remember; ever since I have been old enough to read Democratic platforms.

I think I will cite in due season an extract from the Commoner. It says that the day the Democratic Party returns to a protective tariff or a tariff for any purpose to foster an industry in this country the Democrats will be laughed out of the campaign. In the war of 1812 we had all the protection we needed here. In 1801, or later, during the Jefferson administration or its successor, when the embargo was on, we had all the protection. We have it now, even with the great war across the sea.

It is proposed, if the morning reports be true, to begin a duty on dyestuffs in order to foster what Secretary Redfield calls an incipient industry after the close of the war. What has become of sugar? That is for revenue. We need the $52,000,000 or $54,000,000 every 12 months. That is not for protection. I do not care what your motive is; lay the duty, and the rest of it will come. So I ask the keynote sounder these questions in the future, when he shall arrive clothed with all the terrible majesty that belongs to the majority leader and filled to bursting with the secrets of state. I propound to him now these questions. Answer them or acknowledge that you are up a tree and you can not.

LETTER FROM GOV. WOODROW WILSON, OF NEW JERSEY, TO HON. A. MITCHELL PALMER, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

FEBRUARY 5, 1913.

MY DEAR PALMER: Thank you warmly for your letter of February 3. It was characteristically considerate of you to ask my views with regard to the joint resolution which has just come over from the House to the Senate with regard to the presidential term.

I have not hitherto said anything about this question, because I had not observed that there was any evidence that the public was very much interested in it. I must have been mistaken in this, else the Senate would hardly have acted so promptly upon it.

SPOKE WITHOUT RESERVE.

It is a matter which concerns the character and conduct of the great office upon the duties of which I am about to enter. I feel therefore that in the present circumstances I should not be acting consistently with my ideals with regard to the rule of entire frankness and plain speaking that ought to exist between public servants and the public whom they serve if I did not speak out about it without reserve of any kind and without thought of the personal embarrassment.

The question is simply this: Shall our Presidents be free, so far as the law is concerned, to seek a second term of four years, or shall they be limited by constitutional amendment to a single term of four years or to a single term extended to six years?

I can approach the question from a perfectly impersonal point of view, because I shall most cheerfully abide by the judgment of my party and the public as to whether I shall be a candidate for the Presidency again in 1916. I absolutely pledge myself to resort to nothing but public opinion to decide that question.

The President ought to be absolutely deprived of every other means of deciding it. He can be. I shall use to the utmost every proper influence within my reach to see that he is, before the term to which I have been elected is out. That side of the matter need disturb no one.

TOO LONG OR TOO SHORT.

And yet, if he be deprived of every other means of deciding the question, what becomes of the argument for a constitutional limitation to a single term? The argument is not that it is clearly known now just how long each President should remain in office. Four years is too long a term for a President who is not the true spokesman of the people, who is imposed upon and does not lead. It is too short a term for a President who is doing, or attempting a great work of reform, and who has not had time to finish it.

To change the term to six years would be to increase the likelihood of its being too long, without any assurance that it would, in happy cases, be long enough. A fixed constitutional limitation to a single term of office is highly arbitrary and unsatisfactory from every point of view.

The argument for it rests upon temporary conditions which can easily be removed by law. Presidents, it is said, are effective for one-half of their term only because they devote their attention during the last two years of the term to building up the influences, and above all, the organization, by which they hope and purpose to secure a second nomination and election.

AGAINST PRESIDENTIAL CONVENTION.

It is their illicit power, not their legitimate influence with the country, that the advocates of a constitutional change profess to be afraid of, and I heartily sympathize with them. It is intolerable that any President should be permitted to determine who should succeed him—himself or another—by patronage or coercion, or by any sort of control of the machinery by which delegates to the nominating convention are chosen.

There ought never to be another presidential nominating convention; and there need never be another. Several of the States have successfully solved that difficulty with regard to the choice of their governors, and Federal law can solve it in the same way with regard to the choice of Presidents. The nominations should be made directly by the people at the polls.

Conventions should determine nothing but party platforms and should be made up of the men who would be expected, if elected, to carry those platforms into effect. It is not necessary to attend to the people's business by constitutional amendment if you will only actually put the business into the people's own hands.

I think it may safely be assumed that that will be done within the next four years; for it can be done by statute; it need not wait for constitutional change. That being done, the question of the presidential term can be discussed on its merits.

PRESIDENCY IS ABNORMAL.

It must be clear to everybody who has studied our political development at all that the character of the Presidency is passing through a transitional stage. We know what the office is now and what use must be made of it; but we do not know what it is going to work out into; and until we do know, we shall not know what constitutional change, if any is needed, it would be best to make.

I must speak with absolute freedom and candor in this matter, or not speak at all; and it seems to me that the present position of the Presidency in our actual system, as we use it, is quite abnormal and must lead eventually to something very different.

He is expected by the Nation to be the leader of his party as well as the Chief Executive officer of the Government, and the country will take no excuses from him. He must play the part and play it successfully or lose the country's confidence. He must be prime minister, as much concerned with the guidance of legislation as with the just and orderly execution of law, and he is the spokesman of the Nation in everything, even the most momentous and most delicate dealings of the Government with foreign nations.

SHOULD BE HELD RESPONSIBLE.

Why in such circumstances should he be responsible to no one for four long years? All the people's legislative spokesmen in the House of Representatives and one-third of their representatives in the Senate are brought to book every two years; why not the President, if he is to be the leader of the party and the spokesman of policy?

Sooner or later, it would seem, he must be made answerable to opinion in a somewhat more informal and intimate fashion—answerable, it may be, to the Houses whom he seeks to lead, either personally or through a Cabinet, as well as to the people for whom they speak. But that is a matter to be worked out—as it inevitably will be—in some natural American way which we can not yet even predict.

The present fact is that the President is held responsible for what happens in Washington in every large matter, and so long as he is commanded to lead he is surely entitled to a certain amount of power—all the power he can get from the support and convictions and opinions of his fellow countrymen; and he ought to be suffered to use that power against his opponents until his work is done. It will be very difficult for him to abuse it. He holds it upon sufferance, at the pleasure of public opinion. Everyone else, his opponents included, has access to opinion, as he has. He must keep the confidence of the country by earning it, for he can keep it in no other way.

MAKE IT TWO TERMS.

Put the present customary limitation of two terms into the Constitution, if you do not trust the people to take care of themselves, but make it two terms (not one, because four years is often too long), and give the President a chance to win the full service by proving himself fit for it.

If you wish to learn the result of constitutional ineligibility to re-election, ask any former governor of New Jersey, for example, what the effect is in actual experience. He will tell you how cynically and with what complacence the politicians banded against him waited for the inevitable end of his term to take their chances with his successor.

Constitutions place and can place no limitations upon their power. They may control what governors they can as long as they please as long as they can keep their outside power and influence together. They smile at the coming and going of governors as some men in Washington have smiled at the coming and going of Presidents, as upon things ephemeral, which passed and were soon enough got rid of if you but sat tight and waited.

As things stand now the people might more likely be cheated than served by further limitations of the President's eligibility. His fighting power in their behalf would be immensely weakened. No one will fear a President except those whom he can make fear the elections.

We singularly belie our own principles by seeking to determine by fixed constitutional provision what the people shall determine for themselves and are perfectly competent to determine for themselves. We cast a doubt upon the whole theory of popular government.

I believe that we should fatally embarrass ourselves if we made the constitutional change proposed. If we want our Presidents to fight our battles for us, we should give them the means, the legitimate means, the means their opponents will always have. Strip them of everything else but the right to appeal to the people, but leave them that; suffer them to be leaders; absolutely prevent them from being bosses.

We would otherwise appear to be going in two opposite directions. We are seeking in every way to extend the power of the people, but in the matter of the Presidency we fear and distrust the people and seek to bind them hand and foot by rigid constitutional provision. My own mind is not agile enough to go both ways.

I am very well aware that my position on this question will be misconstrued, but that is a matter of perfect indifference to me. The truth is much more important than my reputation for modesty and lack of personal ambition. My reputation will take care of itself, but constitutional questions and questions of policy will not take care of themselves without frank and fearless discussion.

NOT URGING OWN REELECTION.

I am not speaking for my own reelection; I am speaking to redeem my promise that I would say what I really think on every public question and take my chances in the court of public opinion.

LETTER FROM HON. W. J. BRYAN TO WALTER W. VICK.

The letter addressed to Walter W. Vick dated August 20, 1913, is as follows:

Now that you have arrived and have acquainted yourself with the situation, can you let me know what positions you have at your disposal with which to reward deserving Democrats? Whenever you desire a suggestion from me in regard to a man for any place down there call on me.

You have had enough experience in politics to know how valuable workers are when the campaign is on and how difficult it is to find suitable rewards for the deserving. I do not know to what extent a knowledge of the Spanish language is necessary for employees. Let me know what is requisite, together with the salary, and when appointments are likely to be made. Sullivan will be down before long and you and he together ought to be able to bring about such reforms as may be necessary there. You will find Sullivan a strong, courageous, reliable fellow. The more I have seen of him the better satisfied I am that he will fit into the place there and do what is necessary to be done.

Very truly, yours, W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Sherman
Brandegee	Harding	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Hardwick	Oliver	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Overman	Taggart
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Thomas
Colt	Jones	Pittman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lane	Pomerene	Warren
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Williams
Dillingham	Lewis	Saulsbury
Fletcher	Lippitt	Shafroth
Gallinger	McLean	Sheppard

Mr. THOMAS. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who is ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have responded to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HUSTING, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. WORKS answered to their names when called.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. JAMES, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STONE, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is my intention to adhere rather closely to a discussion of the bill now before the Senate and to certain amendments which in the course of time I shall offer to it.

I suggest, Mr. President, that in view of the very small number of Senators present we might be able to keep order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is a good suggestion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to ask the Senator from Iowa if his amendments have been printed and laid on the desks of Senators?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not printed. They are simply motions to strike out certain parts of the bill.

However firm the intention I have just expressed may be, I may be permitted to indulge in a preliminary observation. I listened with both care and interest to the discussion presented by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. It was a clear and comprehensive statement of the subject covered by the bill from his point of view, and he ought to be congratulated upon the good temper which he displayed. I think the average number of Senators, and I was careful to observe this fact, who heard his discussion was six. He was entitled to a better audience.

I have listened with pleasure and profit to the argument presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in opposition to the bill. I was not so situated that I could hear the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] or the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], but I have no doubt what I am about to say respecting the speeches I did hear was equally true of the two which I was so unfortunate as to miss. These addresses were all of high character; they also were comprehensive, the result of much study and examination, and were well worthy of their distinguished authors. The average number of Senators who heard these speeches was four and a half. I am not mentioning these facts in order to censure any Senator on either the Democratic side of the Chamber or upon the Republican side of the Chamber, for I think that on both sides they are pursuing a very logical course. The only person for whom I am profoundly sorry is the Vice President, who presides so gracefully and so impartially over this tribunal. It is his unhappy fate to be compelled to sit in the Chamber attempting to preserve order over one speaker and something like 90 empty chairs. It has convinced me that the salary of the Presiding Officer of the Senate ought to be doubled in order to compensate him for the torture which he must constantly feel.

In saying this I am not disparaging the character of the speeches, but it must be depressing and dispiriting to sit where one must face a single speaker and a whole array of vacant seats.

The observation which I have taken the liberty to make is this: We shall destroy the Senate, the confidence of the people in it, its influence in the affairs of the country, unless we change the habit into which we are rapidly falling.

I said that I did not censure any Democratic Senator for absenting himself during this discussion. Why do I not? Simply because he could accomplish no valuable purpose by being present. Every Democratic Senator in some fashion or other has made it known that he intends to vote for this bill. I do not inveigh against the caucus; I have done that so often that I am tired of it, and I do not care whether there has been a caucus upon this bill or not; but in some way or other it has come to be understood that every Senator in the majority will vote for the bill; that he has made up his mind deliberately and fully upon the subject. Why should he listen to anyone who is presenting objections to the bill? Why should he listen to the chairman of the committee reporting the bill as he expounds it? There is no reason for further enlightenment; the minds are made up, and therefore the empty chairs upon the other side of the Chamber,

Turning to my own side of this eminent tribunal, there is no reason why any Republican should listen to any argument made either for or against this bill, or any other that comes out of a caucus or a conference which secures adhesion in advance to a measure about to be proposed. Why should Republicans sit here and listen? They may be glad to hear what their associates have to say about a particular subject, but they know that all that is being said is absolutely unavailing.

There is no longer any debate in the Senate of the United States. There are political speeches in the Senate; there are violent partisan harangues in the Senate. I am not objecting to that, because that is all that apparently remains for Members of the Senate to do; to make orations which are intended not to convince any Senator of any proposition, but to inflame or to instruct, as the case may be, the minds of the American people.

If I had my way, if my associates on this side of the Chamber would agree with me, every Republican Senator would absent himself and would refuse to participate in legislation that comes to the Senate with the knowledge that one side of this tribunal has already made up its mind finally and completely upon the subject to be acted upon by the Senate. To me it is a farce for Republicans to sit here and to join in a discussion which they can not influence in the slightest degree, no matter how potent their arguments may be. The course I propose would be, in a sense, an abdication, I suppose, of our duty; but there is no other way in which the change that has been wrought in the proceedings of the Senate can ever be brought emphatically to the attention of the American people.

I say this with the utmost good feeling. I charge no one Senator with responsibility for it. I only know that it has come to pass and that it is rapidly degrading the Senate of the United States; it is rapidly robbing it of all the influence it ever possessed in the affairs of the country; and if it is pursued, whether by one side of the Chamber or by the other side of the Chamber, it will ultimately mean the abolition of the Senate; and it ought to mean its extinction.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] first rose, and I yield to him.

Mr. OVERMAN. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that all the Senator from Iowa says is true, why all this speaking? Why all this delay? Why all these political speeches? Why not come to a vote on this bill? We have been ready to vote for some time and the bill has been before the Senate for some time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer to the Senator's question is perfectly easy. If I could persuade all the Senators of my political faith to put the whole responsibility on that side of the Chamber and simply retire, I would be glad to do it; but I can not do that; and, inasmuch as the discussion is going on, I intend that the country shall know my views with regard to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when the Senator rises to speak he always discusses the question which is before the Senate, but we can not say that of all the other Members on either side.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I have already said that this Chamber is ringing with political discussions that have no relevancy to the subject under consideration, and the majority is responsible for it, inasmuch as it decides in advance, in its own councils, with respect to legislation that is to be passed. There is no other recourse but to allow the Republicans in the body to speak to the country instead of to Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are not speaking to the country on this bill. They are speaking generally and holding up the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me to answer. I do not think Senators are holding up the bill. The exasperation of sitting here with a bill before us to which many of us are opposed and knowing that every argument which we may make is addressed to deaf ears compels the Republican side of the Chamber—or I do not say "compels," but rather tempts the Republican side of the Chamber—into the long discussions which we have heard. Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I was wondering why the Senator from Iowa said, as he has said more than once, that he holds nobody responsible for this condition of things. The truth about it is that there is not a single Member of this body who is not to some extent responsible for the condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just the reason I said what I did, that there is no one person responsible. We have taken on a habit, a custom; we are gradually yielding to the demand that legislation come only from the majority. We are giving currency to the statement made all the while, that only the majority is responsible for legislation. I do not agree to that proposition.

There are some questions upon which the majority might be said to be wholly responsible—those which concern matters that involve the party faith or the party creed; but the questions that we generally have before us are not partisan questions; they have not been determined by any party platform; they are proposed for the public good; and it is just as much treason to the form of our Government for a part of the Senate to separate itself from the other and to decide what shall be done, what laws shall be passed, what amendments shall be received or adopted, if any, as it would be if you were to coerce the minority by force.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa that nobody is responsible. I should put it the other way and say that everybody is responsible. We have to correct this evil ourselves; it can not be done by one man; it can not be done by talking about it; but there has to be a radical change in the manner of conducting the business of the Senate, or the Senate will not be worth respecting after a while. It is not entitled to very much respect now because of the manner in which it is proceeding at the present moment. Here are caucuses being held night after night and day after day to determine what this body shall do, and when that caucus reaches a determination, that settles the whole question, and the remainder of us might just as well go home, as I am going to do in a few days.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from California, agreeing with me so entirely with regard to the evil, differs so radically from me as to the method of my stating it. However, I expressed it as it occurred to me and as it now appears to me. No one Senator is responsible for the condition in which we find ourselves. We have drifted into the situation on account, apparently, of a desire on the part of the administration to claim all the credit for every act that is passed and to deny to this side of the Chamber every responsibility or credit for anything that is accomplished in the Senate. I have said now, Mr. President, all that I desire to say upon this subject.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not a fact that the Senator himself has introduced two or three bills, which have become laws, during the time that the present party and administration have been in power?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think, then, that the charge the Senator makes is entirely justified.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is another difficulty with Senators upon the other side. I have made the statement. The Senators upon the other side know perfectly well what I meant. I can not stop to qualify with nicety the technicalities which may be involved. Senators know perfectly well that what I meant was the program of the administration.

There was some reason for solidarity, caucus action, conference action, or whatever it may be called, upon the tariff bill, because there is a distinct difference and an impassable chasm between the Democratic view and the Republican view with respect to the composition of a tariff; but there has been no other great measure passed since that time, and none is now proposed, that touches in any way the party faith, and the Democratic majority, looking forward to the consequences that must ensue, ought not to treat these bills as party measures.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is unfortunate that so many Senators are absent during the discussion of an important measure like this. There has been no hard and fast agreement reached in caucus as to the precise terms of this proposed legislation. There has been an understanding that the administration and this side of the Chamber, at least, were in favor of a ship-purchase bill. The bill as it came from the House, and as it has been here for some time, was in the main satisfactory to this side and favored by this side. It seems to me we can not be blamed, if we have the view that this bill ought to pass, if we report it and urge its passage, and we can not be blamed if Senators on this side of the Chamber are unwilling to stay here and hear harangues by the hour on subjects which have nothing in the world to do with the bill. If there were a legitimate, fair discussion of the measure before the Senate I believe Members on this side would be here.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on his side of the Chamber there are now about nine Senators present, which is an unusually large number, but if the discussion were confined—I do not know whether we can do it under the present rules, but it is a matter to be thought out as having reference to situations such as the Senator suggests—to the subject before the Senate, I believe that that would tend in a large measure to promote better consideration, more attention to the debates, and better debates generally in the Senate.

It seems to me that is a proper matter, perhaps, in the future to deal with, although it can not relieve us in the present situation. I am simply saying that I believe, even now, if the debates were upon the question before the Senate, instead of long drawn-out talk for consumption elsewhere and not expected to be listened to here, Senators would not be worn out and would not be compelled to seek some sort of shelter in the cloakroom because of that sort of performance.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there can be no real debate when the question has been foreclosed. It is impossible to confine discussion to the question under consideration when those who discuss it know that every word they say is unavailing; that it can not influence any single mind in the majority, and can not change the decree that had been rendered before the Senate took the bill up for consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, on the President's program was a celebrated bill, in the framing of which the Senator himself aided very materially in securing proper legislation. I think one or two or probably three amendments offered by him were adopted after discussion. We had the responsibility for the legislation; it was on our program, but the Senator, with his great ability, came in and was instrumental in amending it, so that it was a much better bill when we had concluded its consideration than when it had been originally brought in. I refer to the rural-credits bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember, Mr. President, any such instance; but it may be so.

Mr. President, every American citizen, no matter what his political affiliations may be, wants to see enough American ships upon the ocean so that the United States will be as prominent in this field of commercial activity as it is in every other. Does any Senator doubt that? Is it not true that all loyal and intelligent American citizens desire an American fleet of merchant ships which will be commensurate with the volume of business which we transact with the world? There are so many reasons for this desire on the part of our people that it is unnecessary for me to even mention them.

I might just as well argue whether it would be better for this country if the great fruitful regions of the West were turned into an arid desert as to inquire whether it would be better for this country if we were as dominant upon the sea as we are upon the land. I do not intend to name the reasons, because I would be disparaging the intelligence as well as the patriotism of all the people of this country if I were to attempt to convince them, or to convince Senators, of the proposition I have just stated. Would it not be well, therefore, if you on the other side of the Chamber and we on this side of the Chamber should meet and consult with respect to this important matter free from any political bias or prejudice, and ascertain, if we can, whether or not there is a way by which this vital object can be attained?

Now, come with me and see if you do not agree to this further proposition. The people of this country are full of enterprise, strong with genius, and irresistible in any encounter in which they enter with a fair and even chance. Moreover, they have an abundance, a superabundance of capital, to organize and carry forward the business of transportation upon the high seas. Will anyone question the truth of the statement I have just made? If our people could master the seas and the transportation upon them they long ago would have set afloat a merchant marine that would arouse as much pride in the American heart as has the great triumphs which we have witnessed upon the land.

A third proposition. The sea is open—open to every comer. If our people could have carried forward this conflict successfully, with an open sea, with every port in the civilized world wide open for the admission of our ships, they would have gone into the business, and they would have reflected the same honor upon the American name in this respect as they have reflected upon it in every other respect. Why, then, have we no merchant fleet engaged in foreign commerce commensurate with our population, our territory, our business, and our commerce? That is the important question, and I ask it not only of Senators here but of the country. Why is it that upon the high seas our flag is so rare that it occasions deep surprise when the eye of an American citizen falls upon it? Again, the answer is obvious, and no one will dispute it. If there is any one here who cares to contradict me and answer the question I have myself put, I hope he will take the liberty of contradicting what I have said.

Our people have not constructed and are not operating merchant vessels engaged in commerce with foreign nations because it costs more to own and operate an American ship than it does to own and operate a foreign ship, and it costs so much more that the business is not profitable; and men of wealth, men of enterprise, will not enter into it for the reason that it affords no reasonable chance of fair reward for either the capital invested or the energy expended. That is the reason. It is the only reason. If Americans could acquire ships and operate them under our registry with a profit, with such profit as they have been able to reap when they employ their strength and their capital upon land, long ago the ocean would have been covered with American ships, and the American flag would be seen in every quarter of the globe, in every port in the world.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator mind being interrupted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr BRANDEGEE. I agree entirely with the statement the Senator has just made, but I did not understand to what he referred when he stated that Americans would have covered the seas with their ships if the ports of other countries were freely opened to them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said the ports of other countries were wide open to them. There is no restriction anywhere, so far as I know.

With this statement with regard to the situation of Americans and as to the merchant marine, mark another suggestion: The American ship must compete with the foreign ship, and it will not undertake the hopeless task under existing conditions. If we are able to build up an adequate fleet of American ships engaged in the foreign trade, we must in some way relieve our ships of the unequal competition which now exists. We have—whether wisely or unwisely, I will not pause to inquire—relieved American shipping of some of the burdens that formerly were laid upon it. We did it in an act which permitted Americans to buy foreign-built ships and register them under the American flag, so that they became American ships. But that is not enough. That is but a little part of the burden which American shipping has to bear in competition with foreign shipping.

How will you relieve American ships of the burden and how will you make the competition equal and fair, when you know that it not only costs more to build an American ship than it does a foreign one, but that it costs 30 per cent more to operate an American ship than it does a foreign one? You have already reached the conclusion that in some manner we must improve these conditions, which create an unfair and unequal competition, and against which no energy, no capital, no genius, no patriotism, can successfully strive. How will you equalize these conditions?

I put that to my friends upon the Democratic side of the Chamber. How will you do it? We have done it to a degree, as I said a moment ago, by allowing Americans to buy foreign-built ships. But we have only begun. We still have to overcome the greatest obstacle of all, the increased cost of operation of American ships as compared with foreign ships. Unless you have presented a bill which will remove these difficulties, which hitherto have been insurmountable, your proposed legislation will accomplish nothing. How do you propose to do it?

I assert that there is nothing whatsoever in the bill now before the Senate that will in the slightest degree affect the condition which I have suggested. Somehow—I do not pause to say how, because that would draw me into a field which I do not intend to enter at this time—somehow the people of the whole country, acting through their Government, must aid American ships sufficiently to overcome the obstacles I have described. Senators all know that I have never favored a money subsidy given to a few ships. I do not favor that plan now.

But in some way we must accomplish the purpose I have suggested or there will be no American ships on the sea when normal conditions are restored. There will be no American merchant marine. The man who deludes himself by thinking that we can, by the intervention of a shipping board, or a corporation to be organized by the shipping board, remove these inequalities of competition, these inequalities of conditions under which the business is done, deceives himself, possibly, but he will deceive no one else. I ask the question again: What is there in this bill that affords American shipping any relief whatsoever as against these conditions? There is nothing. Let us see.

The bill proposes in the first place to organize a shipping board. The shipping board may acquire ships, if it acts indedendently and not through the intermediary of a private corporation, to the extent of $50,000,000. It then proposes to charter or lease these ships to some one who desires to enter the business. How will that overcome the difference between the cost of operation seen in American shipping and in foreign shipping? How will it? What do you propose that the board shall do? Will it lease the ships to an operator for nothing? Is that the idea of the bill? But even if that were so, it would not be sufficient. It would not be enough. It would not be enough if a company could take the ship for nothing, to enable American ships to compete with foreign ships so long as the cost of operating the foreign ship is as much less as it is now.

But I take it for granted that the proposers of this measure do not contemplate leasing the ships without any compensation to those who are to operate them. What is the idea of the author of the bill, or the authors of the bill, upon that point? I ask the Senator from Florida directly, Does he expect the board, when it acquires these ships, to charter or lease them without compensation to companies which desire to operate them?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the provision with reference to operation, of course, gives power to this board to offer the ships to people who desire to operate ships upon terms and conditions which the board will name; and if they find that they are unable to get satisfactory bidders, they make that report, and then the corporation is given authority to operate itself. But as to whether or not the terms, when they offer the ships, will include the idea that they are not to be compensated for the use of the ships, of course, is something as to which I could not say. That is a matter that is left with the board.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, Mr. President. I am now speaking of the board and not of the corporation which may or may not be organized under the bill. The board acquires, we will assume, ships that will cost it $50,000,000. It has them now, ready for operation. It advertises for bids for these ships upon charter or lease. But the Senator from Florida knows that anyone who buys or takes the ships must pay from 20 to 30 per cent more for operating them than its foreign competitor must pay; and who will offer to charter or lease these ships under those conditions?

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it there will be no difficulty about finding people who will want to charter or lease these ships. The demand for ships to-day is such that undoubtedly it would be a most profitable business to engage in. Why should there be any doubt in the Senator's mind that people will be found who would like to charter or lease good cargo carriers?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, I am not speaking of these times. I am speaking of normal times—times of peace. At the present time there is not a ship in the world that can be bought without paying twice as much as it is worth. There is not a ship in the world that is unemployed, which is suitable for carrying freight. There is no possibility of the board, or the corporation either, doing anything whatsoever under this bill until peace comes and commerce and business and trade are restored to their ordinary condition. I am speaking now of the time before the war.

Let us look at the time before the war. We had no merchant marine then, and it was just as desirable to expand it, and much more so, than it is just now. Why did not Americans build ships or buy ships then and enter the over-seas trade?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's question, I think it would scarcely be fair to suppose that even when this war closes conditions will be as they were before the war commenced; because, in the first place, 3,000,000 tons of shipping have entirely disappeared and gone to the bottom of the ocean. That tonnage is eliminated absolutely, not to reappear when the war ends.

The portion of the world's shipping that has been thus eliminated is estimated to-day at 3,000,000 tons, and they are sinking them every day. We see in the morning paper where this merchant ship has gone down and the other merchant ship has gone down, and so forth. So that the world's supply of tonnage at the close of the war will not equal the supply at the commencement of the war by, it is reasonable to estimate, I should say, 4,000,000 tons out of about 42,000,000 tons. That will be felt, undoubtedly, so that there will be a greater demand for ships for some time after the war than there was before the war commenced; and even if that were not the case, there was money in shipping before the war. There was American money invested in ships in the foreign trade before the war. One hundred million dollars of American money was invested in ships engaged in the foreign trade; so that we can not say that at that time there would have been no demand for these ships.

Mr. CUMMINS. Were these ships carrying the American flag?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; they were not—very few of them. Only those to which we gave special subvention contracts ever carried the American flag?

Mr. CUMMINS. Why did they not carry the American flag?

Mr. FLETCHER. They claimed that the difference in cost of operation was one reason. They claimed that some of the requirements of our laws as to space and as to equipment and provisions of various kinds were more strict than foreign laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. We still have those regulations.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have now the regulations of which most maritime nations approve. Our regulations are really no more strict than the London conference regulations.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are stricter than they have ever been before.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; and they are stricter in the case of other maritime nations than they formerly were.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope so, for humanity's sake.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I want to say to the Senator that I think I can establish to his satisfaction that this difference in cost of operation, which has been urged by those interested in shipping as a reason why they did not propose to operate under the American flag has practically disappeared. The wage cost to-day is practically the same in the great shipping ports of the United States both as to vessels flying our flag and as to vessels flying foreign flags. That has been accomplished largely through the operation of the seamen's law. Precisely what was predicted by the friends of that measure has taken place. It is not merely taking place, but it has taken place, so that in these ports to-day the foreign ship has to pay the same wages that the American ship does; and in the ports abroad the American ship has to pay the same as the foreign ship, and that has done away with this difference in cost of operation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very glad to have had this reply from the Senator from Florida, because it proves, just as I thought it would, that there is absolutely no necessity for this bill, and it is not this bill which will put American ships on the sea with our flag, but it is, if it comes to pass, a change in conditions. After the war is over and the world has become placid again, if Americans can successfully compete with foreigners in commerce upon the high seas they will compete.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, would it not be easy, after this war, to lease out these vessels to American companies on a basis which would pay 4 per cent interest on the amount due and 5 per cent annually on the principal, which would relieve us from any cost whatever with reference to them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think an operator would charter them at all, on account of the restrictions that are found in the bill and on account of the necessity of dealing with the Government. If the business comes to be a profitable one, it will be developed. We have energy and genius and capital enough to develop every private business with profit in it. The only possible thing that this bill can do is to furnish capital to those who are seeking profit at a lower rate of interest, if you please, than they are willing to furnish it for themselves.

I agree that if there were in this bill a provision that the board should rent or charter these ships for nothing, we might put some ships on the sea if conditions prevailed as suggested by the Senator from Florida; but there is no such provision in the bill. There is absolutely nothing to guide the board in regard to the matter. There is no rule; there is no standard. You have simply created a board and given it $50,000,000 to invest in ships; and that, so far as these ships are concerned, is the end of the governmental power.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Did I not understand the Senator to say, a few moments ago, that if the ships were leased out for nothing under the American flag, they could not enter in competition with foreign ships?

Mr. CUMMINS. Under conditions as they were before the war, they could not.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator also said that the cost of operation was from 20 to 30 per cent higher.

Mr. CUMMINS. About 30 per cent higher.

Mr. BRYAN. What makes that?

Mr. CUMMINS. The higher compensation of officers, the higher wages paid to Americans whom we employ, the greater space that we require for the health and comfort of the crew, and a variety of other regulations which are intended for the benefit or safety either of those who travel upon the ships or of those who operate the ships.

Mr. BRYAN. Since the war began we have passed the seamen's bill. Does that make the cost of operation greater as compared with the cost of operation abroad?

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends altogether upon a question which has not been settled. If we can rigidly maintain these regulations against foreign ships, so far as they are covered by the seamen's bill, there would be uniformity between foreign ships and American ships; but the seamen's bill has nothing to say with regard to the wages of either officers or crew.

Mr. BRYAN. The wages on board American ships are higher than on board foreign ships?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I should think they are about three times as great.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, in what way, in the Senator's opinion, can American ships compete with foreign ships? How are we going to get the American flag back on the sea?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not for me to prepare a plan under the present régime.

Mr. BRYAN. I was interested in the Senator's statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I am perfectly willing to say that I agree with the suggestions of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I believe the only way in which we will ever be able to create a merchant fleet commensurate with our strength as a commercial nation is to discriminate in our ports in favor of American ships. Now, I understand perfectly that that is in essence a subsidy. Everything of that sort is a subsidy. This bill is full of subsidies. But that is the fairest and justest way of distributing among the people of the United States the aid that we give to the ships.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator means, of course, a discrimination in tariff duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. A discrimination in tariff duties.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, allowing goods to be brought over in American bottoms at a lower rate than they are in other bottoms.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is a provision like that in the so-called Underwood tariff bill, is there not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; and a very good provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. And it has been upheld by two courts, every court it has been before so far, has it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. But not enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is pending in the Supreme Court of the United States now, as I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe so.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is a difference of 5 per cent in tariff duties under that provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether or not that discrimination is sufficient, Mr. President.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I do not, either. That is a mere experiment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not commit myself to that; but I believe the principle is right. We must readjust, of course, our treaties with commercial nations in order to carry out that policy without friction and disagreeable conflict.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will recall that in 1815 we had in force in effect a law as to discriminating duties. The Senator will recall, I presume, that from 1815 to 1828 every Congress denounced the policy, and it was finally abandoned in 1828.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was finally abandoned, Mr. President, because we did not need it. From 1815 to 1860 it was entirely possible for the people of the United States to compete with the world in traffic on the high seas. We had an advantage which no other great nation had. We have lost that advantage for one reason at least, namely, that we have turned from wooden ships to iron or steel ships. We have turned from sailing ships to steamships. I think this change has had much to do with the disappearance of the American fleet from the seas.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly that did have, later on; but that did not occur until quite some time after that. However, we abandoned this policy in 1828, not, as the Senator says, because we did not need it, I believe, but because we found that every other country was indulging in retaliatory laws against us; and every other country has done the same thing that we did—abandoned these discriminating duties.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to answer that suggestion——

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. We adopted it again in 1913, too, with the Senator's vote. The policy that he says we abandoned the Senator from Florida voted for in 1913; and the policy that we then adopted has been sustained in every court of the United States where its validity has been attacked, in spite of the position of the Department of Justice about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. In part.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did not the Senate strike out that provision?

Mr. HARDWICK. It restored it, then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But finally we were forced to yield to it in conference. The vote of the Senate was against it.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the Senator voted for the conference report, too.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because we could not get it through in any other way. We struck out that provision when freely acting upon it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it was restored by a conference report which was agreed to here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Without a roll call, and without knowing it was in it. The Senate is against it, and I hope it will stay so.

Mr. CUMMINS. It matters not. It became the action of Congress and, in my opinion, it is the only way in which we can render the aid that is necessary to American shipping unless we are willing to grant a money subsidy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. That, as I said before, I am unwilling to grant. I do not shrink from the fact that we are attempting to aid American ships, because no matter what form the assistance may take we are still subsidizing them in a way. I have always objected to the money subsidy because it is impossible to render its distribution fair and just; it is impossible to see that it finally reaches the person or persons who ought to receive it. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What practical effect so far as the Treasury is concerned would there be between collecting this tariff and giving it to shipowners and not collecting it, so far as the Treasury of the United States is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. There would be no difference except in one case the distribution would come automatically. If you impose the discriminating duty the burden is distributed automatically. If the money passes into the Treasury and we then attempt to appropriate it in the form of a subsidy we have to declare who shall receive it, and we are very apt to go astray in undertaking that work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will not the subsidy be based upon the amount of transportation to our ports by the vessels? Would that not be practically the same thing?

Mr. CUMMINS. A bill drawn by the Senator from Georgia might assume that form. I do not know what the bill would be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say it could be done that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it were withdrawn from the Treasury and paid to the ships which actually carried the goods the effect would be exactly the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question at this point? He assumes that there will be no demand for these ships after the war and that we can not get any before the war closes practically, although I am quite sure we can have 50 ships within 12 months of from 7,000 to 8,000 tons cargo carrying. Our own yards are not overcrowded. Other yards are being built and enlarged and extended all the while. New concerns are springing up and building ships. But without going into that, assuming that we could not get the ships until after the war and after the war there was no demand for them, would the Senator think it would be a terrible thing if those ships were operated by corporations in fields that were not particularly profitable along routes that would open new trade, and extend and enlarge the commerce and the opportunities of our manufacturers and producers generally? Even if they were operated without a profit would it not be worth while to do that?

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida where he expects to get ships within the next two years? Where does he expect to get ships under this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me in his time, in some observations which I made the other day, and which I am not sure whether the Senator from Iowa heard or has seen in the RECORD, since he did not make mention of them to-day at his opening, I pointed out distinctly various yards that are being extended and are being built and new yards that are being built in this country, as at Brunswick, Ga., and Savannah, Ga. Over on the west coast the Union Iron Works and other yards are being extended and enlarged. In the testimony of Capt. Bertholf before the committee, if the Senator examined the hearings, he gave a list of places where there are opportunities for building the ships. There is not any doubt in my mind but what we could have 50 ships within 12 months. I gave a list of ships that will be completed next March in various yards, where they are ready for new contracts. There is not any trouble about that.

Mr. NELSON. Those ships are already under contract. The yards that are building extensions are building them for the purpose of filling existing contracts.

Mr. FLETCHER. The contracts will be completed when the ships are launched from the yards, according to this list.

Mr. NELSON. The contracts run clear to 1918.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know some of them do, but they are not waiting for a year to build a ship. These yards are turning out the ships month after month, and as one ship is finished they are ready for another. There is not any trouble about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am afraid I am being led away a little from the path of my argument, but I must reply to the Senator from Florida. I do not believe that ships can be bought at this time without paying a great deal more than they are worth, on account of the stimulation brought about by the war in Europe. I do not believe it will be possible to contract for the building of ships within the next two years upon such terms as we ought to receive.

But passing that, the Senator asked me if it would be out of harmony with my views if the Government had these ships and could not dispose of them or charter them at a profit if it would employ them in commerce, even without any profit at all. The Senator must know my opinion upon that subject. I introduced a substitute for the bill when it was pending in the last Congress which exactly expressed my view about what we ought to do with regard to buying and operating ships.

I think the Government ought to have, as was then proposed, $30,000,000 worth of ships as a supplement to our Navy, and I think they ought to be so constructed, so arranged, that they could be used in commerce when they were not needed in the defense of the country. I would be perfectly willing to see those ships employed in commerce, in opening up new markets for the United States, in pioneering new routes that might in the future become profitable. I provided in the bill which I introduced a plan for so doing. But that is not the plan provided in this bill. There is no suggestion of any plan of that sort.

If it be true, as the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Georgia seem to believe, that when the war closes American ships can enter the ordinary American foreign commerce at a profit they will be found, and these ships will enter that commerce. You can not keep any American from any field in which he finds an opportunity to earn a fortune or to earn a reward upon his capital. America is the richest country in the world. It has more means to invest in any sort of profitable enterprise than any one country, aye, than any two countries, in the whole earth. What can keep Americans out of these enterprises if the conditions are as suggested by the Senator from Florida?

But I do not believe those conditions will exist. I believe at the end of this war the competition upon the high seas will be severer than it ever was before. I believe that Germany and Great Britain and France will make the most heroic, if not superhuman, efforts to regain everything they have lost in this titanic struggle, and American ships will have to meet a competition more rigorous than has ever confronted American shipping.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Florida. He has been on his feet for some time.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator must bear in mind what our experience has been. His theory is all right. It has seemed strange to me that Americans should not go into shipping in view of the profits that there were in that business. There is not any question, and it can be thoroughly established, that there is scarcely any industry anywhere as profitable as was shipping before the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why did not Americans go in, then?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know why except that they were directing their energies toward other things. When they changed the ships from the wooden ships to the iron ships for a while our people were discouraged, and they did not pay great attention to it. Besides, we have a new country, and there were attractions in other directions for their investments, and they did not go into the shipping business as fully as they might, although, as I said awhile ago, there was at least a hundred million dollars of American money under foreign flags in shipping before the war and making good money. But there would have been more if it had been simply a question of their being able to earn profit out of that business, because the record of the ship companies, English and American, all over the world shows that there was no business more profitable than the shipping business. They made all the way from 10 to 300 per cent, according to their own returns.

Now, we know that Americans did not go into that business. We have not any right to assume that they are going to do what they refused to do for 50 years. We would not be justified in assuming that after this war they are going to do other than they did before the war. Therefore we can not leave our commerce wholly dependent upon foreign ships upon the theory that it is going to be a good business and that American money is bound to go into it because it is a good business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in half a moment. I do not agree with what the Senator from Florida now says; but if it is well founded this bill is so indefensible that he ought not to stand for a moment as its sponsor. If it is true that in the old times American ships under the American flag could make from 10 to 300 per cent, and that in the new era conditions will be improved and they can make from 25 to 500 per cent, to stand here and propose to spend $50,000,000 of the people's money in order to encourage a business of that sort is the most startling proposition I ever heard in my life. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not to put money into the pockets of shipowners; it is to get carriers for our business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, one fact is worth a volume of assertion. The Merchant Marine Commission at its hearings in Boston, New York, and Chicago called the great capitalists of those cities to testify, and the question was propounded to them if they could have free ships—that is, if they could buy them abroad—would they invest their money in their operation, and in every instance, as the Senator will find in the testimony taken by that commission, the answer was that they would not, because they could not operate them unless some means were devised to equalize the cost of operating those ships as between foreign ships and American ships.

Now, the Senator from Florida says that Americans have had their money invested in foreign ships and have made money. Certainly they have, but they have made money because their money was invested in ships that flew foreign flags and that had the advantage of low wages and low cost of supplying the crew.

Now, Mr. President, another instance. The Oceanic Line, plying between San Francisco and the Orient and Australasia, with a slight subvention under the mail act of 1881, three or four ships owned by the Spreckels Co., lost $300,000 a year, and it became so intolerable that they tied up the ships at the docks in San Francisco and they were rotting at their cables there for, I think, about three years.

So it is idle to say that Americans could have made money by investing in ships under the conditions that prevailed before the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Hampshire has stated the fact as I have understood it. But I have accepted the great fact, the overpowering and overwhelming fact, that Americans refuse to enter the business. Eager for profit, eager for commercial triumphs, with all the ports of the world open to them, they refuse to enter the business, and it would be impossible to convince me that they refuse to enter it for any other reason than that they can not carry it on profitably in competition with foreign rivals.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the Senator will admit it makes no difference why they refuse to do it; the essential fact, and I agree with him there, is that they did not do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. They did not do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. They would not do it, and refused to do it; and until you give them the difference in cost of operation, as it is claimed, we know that is the situation. Now, suppose that situation continues to exist, where are we?

Mr. CUMMINS. We will have no American shipping, nor will we under this bill, assuming now that like conditions prevail. I do not know whether they will or not; but we certainly should not pass this sort of law upon the assumption that the conditions will be so changed that profit in the business will become obvious and will attract men of capital and of enterprise everywhere.

That is the very difficulty I am trying to point out. Suppose we have the same conditions after the war shall have closed that we had before the war began, and assume that Americans with American ships can not successfully compete with their foreign rivals, what then? How does this bill help to remedy a situation of that kind? What are we doing in the bill to induce men who desire to enter the business and earn a fair reward upon whatever capital they may invest to invest it? What do you offer these men? You offer them nothing whatsoever. You propose to organize a board—that is, assuming it does not work through a corporation as is proposed—that has $50,000,000 at its disposal. We will assume that it will buy the ships mentioned by the Senator from Florida—50 ships costing a million dollars each—what will it do with them? It has no power to operate them. That the Senator from Florida will admit. I think that the mere ownership would imply the authority to operate if it were not that the bill carefully, sedulously prescribes what the board may do with these ships. It may charter or lease them, or it may dispose of them in other ways that are pointed out in the bill. What will the board do? It will advertise for bids for the ships. But what will be the terms upon which the vessels will be leased or chartered? There is no suggestion that we propose to do it for nothing. There is no suggestion of aid unless it be simply in a slight lowering of the rate of interest.

If the President of the United States should say that we will not allow these ships to be leased without a payment of 4 per cent interest, then the board must insist upon 4 per cent interest. Does the Senator from Florida think that, under the assumption that I am making, men of capital will enter this business because they can secure money at the rate of 4 per cent? That is no reward; that is no aid; that is not a sufficient inducement. It will not attract even the casual notice of men who would like to engage in the business.

I want to help the business; I am willing to do something for it; but is the Senator from Florida, or is any other sponsor of the bill, willing to do anything for our foreign commerce? If they assert that they are, and I would accept their word in that respect, we find their maximum proposal is to lease the ships we buy at the rate of 4 per cent interest upon the money invested in them.

To me, Mr. President, the whole scheme is illusive; it is vague; it is futile; it will not accomplish any purpose whatsoever; for if conditions change so that the business becomes attractive and profitable, then we shall not need that the board shall offer these ships in commerce.

I now come to consider, Mr. President, directly and concretely the amendment which I shall first propose, namely, an amendment which is embodied in a motion to strike out section 11. Section 11 of the bill is that part of it which provides that the board, if it sees proper, can organize a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia "for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States."

Whatever the just criticism on the creation of a shipping board may be, it is very insignificant as compared with the criticism that justly falls upon section 11.

One year ago I expressed my views upon this method of regulating commerce, and I do not intend to enter upon the subject at very great length this afternoon. To me it is little less than appalling. I have never examined a legislative proposal that seems so wild and startling and indefensible and uncontrollable as the proposition to organize a corporation under the laws of the District of Columbia to carry on the business which is here described. Some Senators seem to minimize the consequences which may flow from this part of the bill. I do not assert that the board would do what I am about to describe as within its power, but I am never willing, as a Member of the Senate, to grant power to any officer of the United States which I am not willing that he shall exercise.

In the first place, there is no authority whatsoever in Congress to adopt this section. It is not a regulation of commerce; it can not be a regulation of commerce for the shipping board to organize a corporation of which it becomes a majority stockholder; a corporation that is then a corporation for pecuniary profit; a corporation that the minority stockholders will have the right to insist, in the law, shall be conducted in the manner most profitable to the stockholders. To insist that that is or can be a regulation of commerce among the States is so far from my conception of the meaning of the phrase that it is hard for me to understand how any lawyer—or layman, for that matter—can believe that it is a regulation of commerce.

More than a year ago I examined all the authorities upon this question in the presence of the Senate, and I do not intend to repeat what I then said. I content myself with simply asserting that there is no basis whatsoever in the Constitution for the section which I seek to strike out; for it is not a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the States. It is simply yoking up the United States as a stockholder with other stockholders who may be willing—and I can conceive of circumstances under which they would be willing—to invest their money in order to carry on a business for pecuniary profit; not for the benefit of the people, not to secure lower rates, not to obtain just charges for this public service, but to heap up rewards for the capital which is jointly contributed by the United States and by private stockholders. I, of course, do not know that there would be any private persons who would invest. They would, however, if they thought they could, use this corporation for an ulterior purpose, and I drew the picture some time ago of the shrewd bankers and capitalists of New York as they sat around the directors' table or the stockholders' table in the management of this corporation, in which the United States had 51 per cent and the New York capitalists had 49 per cent, and I asked you to imagine, if you could, or to predict, if you could, what would take place around that stockholders' table or in that directors' meeting.

I shrink from even picturing the United States, in its dignity, in its power, in its great altruistic purpose, participating in a directors' meeting that is called and held for the purpose of determining how much can be exacted from commerce in order to yield dividends upon the capital invested in the business. I had hoped that upon reflection those who believe there is good in this measure would at least omit that part of it, for it can accomplish no good purpose. I am sure that no Senator has this in view, but if somebody had not in view a great and important object to be accomplished, not for the public good, but for the acquisition of power, this section in the bill would now be conspicuous by its absence.

Let us see. It authorizes the organization of corporations under the laws of the District of Columbia having a capital of $99,999,999. Does anyone question that? When organized, the Government, through the shipping board, subscribes for $50,000,000 of the capital, and by that subscription becomes a majority stockholder. It is given the power then to purchase, to charter, to lease all the ships that its directors may order; but who are to be its directors? Who is to be its president? Who are to be the officers of the corporation so to be organized under the laws of the District of Columbia? The laws of the District of Columbia require that every director shall be a shareholder. Who are to be the directors? How are you to equip a majority of the directors with a share of stock or any number of shares of stock in order to qualify them as directors? Whom will you trust? The bill as it was debated a year ago or more provided for that exigency, but this bill does not. The only way that one of these companies could be organized under this section of the bill would be to ask some stool pigeon or dummy to take a share of stock belonging to the United States in order to qualify him to become a director and officer of the corporation.

Then, it is provided that the corporation shall stand dissolved five years after the end of the European war. Does the Senator from Florida believe that it is a valid enactment? Five years after the close of the European war the corporation is to stand dissolved. The law of the District of Columbia provides that the articles of incorporation may fix the time for the duration of the corporation, and it may be perpetual, but it describes what shall be done upon dissolution. Upon the dissolution of the corporation on account of the expiration of its charter what happens? Either the corporation itself or an officer appointed for it by the court takes its property, disposes of it, and divides the proceeds among the stockholders in accordance with their holdings.

What does this section provide? It provides that upon the dissolution of the corporation all the property of the corporation shall revert to the shipping board without any further interposition of law, without ascertaining its value, without distribution, without any sale. It is all to revert to the shipping board, and then the shipping board is to pay to the minority stockholders the fair value of their stock. This is a game of "heads I win and tails you lose." The minority stockholders who will be invited to participate or enter into partnership with the United States will be able to do so with the absolute assurance that under no circumstances—I will not say under "no circumstances," but in all human probability—they will not be called upon to share any loss that may be sustained, because the Government is to take and to pay the value of their shares, and if they can not agree, then the value is to be determined by an arbitrator.

I have seen many insane schemes proposed in legislative assemblies; I have seen a good many inadequate and half-baked propositions submitted for legislative consideration, but I have never seen a proposal so crude, so unjust, and so dangerous as the one contained in section 11. It is not only without authority of the Constitution, but it is without policy behind it. Furthermore, it is utterly unwise to enter into a partnership of that kind.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. While the bill makes provision for the minority stockholders and provides that they shall get the fair value of their stock, it makes no provision for the stock in which the United States have invested. That is left out in the cold, and the Government may not get a cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it gets the ships. Whatever the ships are worth, they are turned over to the board representing the United States. If there are minority stockholders, they are simply paid what their interest is worth; and if that can not be reached by agreement it is arbitrated. That does not seem to be a very difficult proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, bearing in mind, Mr. President, what I have said with regard to the manner in which this corporation is organized and the manner in which it must operate; and I repeat that for the moment, because I want to know whether there is anybody who disputes my assertion, that if this corporation is organized and enters the business, whether of chartering ships or of operating ships makes no difference, it is bound under the law to so conduct itself as to make money if money is to be made in the business in which it is to be engaged. Does anybody dispute that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; in one sense.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I should like to hear the sense in which it is disputed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the board has the right to select the routes that are to be used by the vessels under its control. If the general welfare of the people of this country requires, in the judgment of the board, transportation to some point where the traffic is not profitable, the board will have the right to put a line of ships on that route.

The whole scheme involves an effort to broaden the commerce of the United States, to give it a chance to go to the world. The board would not be compelled to select the most profitable place for operation if on that route there was ample transportation for American commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this corporation—and I will correct the Senator from Georgia if he will just wait a moment, for I am sure he was in error——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was not going away. I have gotten excused elsewhere. I wanted to hear the Senator's argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator from Georgia was about to rob me of the delight of his presence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; not at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. This corporation is a corporation for pecuniary profit. It is to be organized under a law which Congress long ago provided for the District of Columbia, and which is intended to organize corporations for pecuniary profit. It is not an eleemosynary institution. It is not a charitable or benevolent institution. It is organized in order to reward the capital invested in it, and the public is invited to invest its money in the enterprise in order that those who invest may make a profit from such investment.

Now, let us see. The board has no power to conduct the affairs of this corporation. The board can not direct what the corporation shall do, except as it can control the election of directors. That is, annually directors are elected, and the board can then exercise the power of a majority stockholder. After that time the corporation is, under the law, in the hands of the board of directors, and the shipping board can not interfere with its ships any more than it can interfere with any other American ships, in my opinion, unless this bill modifies the law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. The answer which the Senator from Iowa has made to the question of the Senator from Georgia would seem to me conclusive, but I wondered if the Senator from Iowa had overlooked another point, which is that under the shipping bill itself the board is obliged to lease these vessels to other parties and not to operate them except in conditions where it is unable to make a suitable lease. There is no assumption in this bill that the board shall operate these ships in any such way as described by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that the board is not to operate them if they can be leased properly. If parties will lease them under reasonable terms to operate them upon lines prescribed by the board—because that power is given the board—they can be leased, and should be leased. If they are leased under the terms prescribed by the board for the routes prescribed by the board, that would be most satisfactory. I was discussing a condition which might confront the board where they could not be leased and where they could be operated in the way I have indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had not finished my answer to the Senator from Georgia. I know he thought it was incomplete, and I now conclude it. Does the Senator from Georgia think that a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, with majority and minority stockholders, can be ordered to do whatever the board thinks it ought to do?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not, unless the terms of the charter subjected it to the direction of the board; but——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have the charter here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But—if the Senator will let me finish answering him—under the terms of this bill the board names the directors, and I think anyone subscribing for stock in this company takes it subject to the limitation of right which this bill carries, and that this corporation must operate along the lines required by the bill, although, I want to add, that I think the possibility of any private citizen taking any stock in this company is hardly to be mentioned. I do not contemplate the possibility of such a thing. I know that if I had quite a large sum of money I would not put any money of mine into it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why will not the Senator join me in striking it out of the bill, then?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator vote with me on that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should want to think about it. I do not think the provision allowing private subscription to the stock worth a snap of the finger. Frankly, I do not think its being in the bill makes it of any account at all, and I do not know that I should object to voting to strike it out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is simply a menace in the bill; that is all. I do not know whether the powers that are here given will ever be exercised or not; but I have already pointed out some of the dangers, and I intend to point out now some more.

I disagree with the Senator from Georgia, however, with regard to the effect of this bill. I do not believe it is a new charter. I do not believe it repeals the incorporation act of the District of Columbia. I think it is simply a sham and a pretense. I can not understand why it is here, because this bill assumes that after the corporation is organized and after these directors are elected and after officers are appointed and after the corporation has begun business the board may order it to do anything it desires without any intervention or will on the part of the corporation. I hope somebody on the other side of the Chamber will undertake some defense of this nameless, vagrant corporation that is intended to be created.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator why I think it is put in.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad the Senator has discovered the reason.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is put in because at present there are complications in the world, and it may be that the ships can be handled better through a corporation than simply by the board. It may be that the board will find that the most practical way to handle it; but unquestionably the Senator will agree with me that this company does not become simply a company under the laws applicable to the District of Columbia. It takes all the limitations which this act places upon it. The provisions of this act become ingrafted into the charter of such a company, and it can not disregard or obviate those responsibilities and those liabilities.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not going to dispute that as a legal proposition. I think it is competent for us to repeal certain parts of the incorporation act of the District of Columbia so far as it relates to a corporation of this sort; and I am simply trying to point out the utter hypocrisy of the whole proposal. After you have organized the corporation with its capital of $99,999,000——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Fifty million dollars.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it can be incorporated with a capital of $99,999,999. All that is necessary is that the shipping board shall own a majority of the stock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Section 11 says that the total capital stock shall not exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Government's interest in the capital stock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it says the total capital stock shall not exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. In any one corporation; but you have authorized here the organization of just as many corporations as $50,000,000 will control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, certainly. I will read it, in order that the RECORD may be clear upon that point:

> That the board, if in its judgment such action is necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, may form under the laws of the District of Columbia one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States. The total capital stock thereof shall not exceed $50,000,000.

Now, what does "thereof" mean?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of all of said companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; of any one of such corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Georgia undertake to correct it in that respect?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would vote to correct it. I so understand it still.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that is the meaning, it is very unhappily expressed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not been able to read it in any other way than that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not say "the total capital stock of one of said companies," but it says that several companies may be organized, the total capital stock of which shall not exceed $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. I construe it to mean the total capital stock of any one of those companies. It may be that that was not intended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I have never heard the suggestion that the Government would put more than $50,000,000 into the capital stock if it took all of the capital stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government is not to put more than $50,000,000 into the capital stock; that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it took all of the capital stock, it could only be $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I will discuss it now upon the basis of the interpretation put upon it by the Senator from Georgia. We have a corporation with a capital stock of $50,000,000, of which the Government, we will assume, owns $25,000,100.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My view is that the Government will own $50,000,000 of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the Senator's view.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not a question about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia is not to manage this board, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but I do not believe any other result will follow.

Mr. CUMMINS. This board is to do what it pleases; and I am not willing to grant power of this sort upon the assumption that the board is omniscient and omnipresent and will be guided by the very highest principles of patriotism and the highest standards of wisdom. No! The board may consider it necessary for the commerce of this country to exercise all the power that is granted to it.

Let us see. The corporation is organized and it selects its board of directors. The board of directors, under the law, elects the officers. I do not know where they are to get directors, unless they take a majority of them from the minority stockholders, for there is not a word of qualification in the law that will permit any other person to become a director or an officer. Then the Senator from Georgia says that the corporation ceases to exist, practically, and that the shipping board shall order its conduct. It shall determine what ships it shall buy. It shall determine what ships it shall lease or charter and the terms upon which the lease or charter shall be made. Is the Senator from Georgia willing to engage in an operation of that sort, so uncandid, so deceptive?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, Mr. President, I say to the Senator that I do not see anything deceptive or uncandid about it. As I understand it, the transaction is this: The board has the right, if it is desired, during the next period of a few years to operate these vessels through a charter, through a corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the bill does not say that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think it does.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the bill says "in order to carry out the purposes of this act."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, for the purpose of carrying out this act, if the board deem it advisable they can obtain a charter for not over $50,000,000. They can take all of the stock. They must take a majority of it in the name of the United States. The United States Government must own the majority of it. It can own all of it. If any private person has money that he wishes to put up alongside of the money of the Government, when the Government has the majority of it—I think nobody would do it—but if anybody wants to do it, I see no objection to it. I think it would be rather a philanthropic investment if it were taken, because the whole tenor of this bill shows that these vessels are to be operated to promote American commerce. They are to be leased out, if it can be done, if parties will take them and operate them upon lines designated, but if they can not, they are to be operated anyhow in order that American commerce may move. I do not think many people would want to take stock in that kind of a company, although it may prove profitable and I do not think its failure to prove profitable would give them any right to interfere with the management.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is just like a thousand other instances of investment in business. Many a man operates through a dummy.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not see anything deceptive about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Many a man organizes a corporation, and has his subordinates, his clerks, those who are subject to his command, to stand before the public as his representatives, as the corporations through which his operations are carried out. The fact that men do it, however, does not, as it seems to me, make it desirable for the Government of the United States to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, it is expressly provided that even if the corporation is organized, the corporation shall not operate these vessels if the board can lease them out. It really amounts to a provision that the board may create a corporation and still control it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; Mr. President. The corporation is to acquire the ships. The corporation is the owner of the ships, and ordinarily the corporation would determine how they were to be operated and to whom they should be chartered. But this bill declares that the board shall determine to whom the ships shall be leased and upon what terms they shall be leased.

But I now carry the Senator from Georgia a little further. He is thinking that the Government is to undertake a liability of not more than $50,000,000. That seems a very small sum in these days. We are appropriating these millions with a prodigality for which history furnishes no precedent. But the Senator is wrong about that. When this corporation is organized with its capital of $50,000,000, what will be its credit? Who is to determine what ships it shall buy, charter, or lease? It is known that the Government of the United States is the owner of a majority of the stock, and what credit does that give the corporation in the markets of the world? I venture to say that the corporation could buy, with this capital of $50,000,000 contributed in this way, a billion dollars' worth of ships. There is absolutely no prohibition as to the amount of indebtedness which the corporation may incur. If the board is as reckless as Congress sometimes is, it can acquire all the ships in the world, because every sensible man, every reasonable man, knows that while there is no legal obligation on the part of the Government, there is a moral obligation to redeem all the debts which may be incurred by this corporation.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the Senator explain, if he can, how this $50,000,000 can be utilized in a double way; that is, in the matter of purchasing, leasing, and chartering vessels, and how still you have $50,000,000 to invest in this corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; that is a pertinent question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to come to that. I am now citing the extent to which this corporation could go in the acquisition of ships by purchase. It can buy——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. It can buy all the $50,000,000 appropriated here will enable it to buy and it can buy all that the credit of the corporation enables it to buy. Now, what will be done?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] seemed in part to be directed to me. If the board puts the money, the $50,000,000, into the corporation, they will operate through the corporation. I do not think the bill contemplates that they should use credit except in so far as it gives them the privilege in section 14.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it is not this bill which gives the corporation the right to utilize its credit. It is the law under which the corporation is organized, which in this respect is in no wise modified by the measure before us. There is no limit, as I read the statute of the District of Columbia on this point, to the indebtedness that a corporation can incur.

Mr. FLETCHER. The act distinctly provides for an expenditure of $50,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; that is the intention of the Senator from Florida, and I have no doubt that is the intention of the Senator from Georgia, but that is not the bill. The bill simply says that the United States shall not incur a liability of more than $50,000,000 under the bill, but when the corporation is organized and it incurs an indebtedness, the limitation of the bill does not apply at all, and there is nothing to stand in the way of the onward march of a corporation of this sort toward the acquisition of all the ships that it can purchase, except the indisposition of the owner of a ship to sell to a corporation of this character.

Now, that is not all. I do not believe the Senator from Georgia wants to give that power to a corporation or to a shipping board. I do not believe the Senator from Florida wants to embark upon so wild an enterprise as that; and, inasmuch as it is agreed that this section is a mere pretense, and that it is to be entirely under the command of the board, why not eliminate it entirely?

Another suggestion, which will be food for thought, I am sure: This corporation—and some of the things I say about the corporation can be said with equal application or truth about the board—this corporation is authorized to charter ships, to lease ships, and re-lease them or recharter them. Is not that true?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. It can go out, therefore, into the markets of the world and lease just as many ships as it pleases. There is no limitation whatever upon its power to lease ships. It can bring under its charter, if it so desires, all the ships of the earth. I do not think that would be done; I do not think it is practicable to do it; but it has the power to accumulate the greatest fleet of any nation on earth. It can charter or lease and then turn over to anyone who would be willing to take these ships upon terms that may be as good as those under which the ships were brought into the possession of the corporation, or they may be chartered under such disastrous terms that the whole business will be demoralized.

Some one said during the course of the debate that the $50,000,000 invested in ships would not present serious competition for privately owned ships; that it would be a drop in the great sea of enterprise. But if the board desires to do so under this bill it can drive every privately owned American ship from the sea; there may not a single one of them remain.

I am not asserting that this will be done, but why confer a power so absolute, so unrestricted, so unqualified? What is in the background that makes it necessary to clothe any officer or series of officers of the Government with so unbridled a discretion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The peculiar condition of the times and the purpose to make it possible to put $50,000,000 back of a corporation to charter vessels, to buy vessels, and to help see to it that there is a chance for American commerce to move under the peculiar circumstances that may confront us a little later on.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in a moment. Mr. President, mark you, I am not arguing now against nor, as the Senator knows, am I opposed to the intervention of the Government in the acquisition of ships. I made that perfectly clear a year ago. But I am unalterably opposed to the method of acquiring and using these ships proposed in this bill. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Georgia a minute ago said it was necessary to obtain ships that American commerce might move. American commerce, I understand, is moving at this very moment in a volume larger than the world ever saw. I believe American commerce is moving at the rate of something over six billion dollars a year, or almost twice as much as American commerce ever did move before in the history of the country. Why, then, do we have to go to this extraordinary novelty in order that American commerce must be made to move?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand perfectly the situation to which the Senator from Rhode Island refers. I understand furthermore that there are places to which the movement of our commerce finds a hindrance. I understand further that there are places to which it is likely in the near future to find more interference. I regard it as a splendid safeguard to make this investment and to make sure that regardless of agreements between allied powers and regardless of methods that may confront us in the near future rather than those now existing to check our commerce, we will at least take a step toward protecting it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the Senator passes from the other statement with reference to the power of this corporation to use these ships and drive out of business all other ships that might be engaged in the same business, I want to suggest to him that the utmost that could be purchased, built, or acquired under the bill for $50,000,000 has been estimated by some at 300,000 tons, by others at 700,000 tons. It may be nearer right to say 500,000 tons. It is estimated that the necessary tonnage to enable American shipping to handle 60 per cent of our commerce would be from 6,000,000 to 10,000,000 tons. Now, if it requires 6,000,000 tons to give us 60 per cent of the tonnage we need, and we can add only 500,000 tons under the bill, how can the Senator argue that that would destroy and drive out of business the 5,500,000 tons?

Mr. CUMMINS. I was pointing out the fact or conclusion of law, whichever it may be called, that under the bill either the board or the corporation could acquire not only the 500,000 tons that might be purchased with $50,000,000, but that it could acquire 10 times that amount with the credit of the corporation, and not only so, but that it could acquire an unlimited tonnage through the process of charter and lease without exceeding the capital or the obligation which the United States undertakes formally.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Florida, who I understand is in charge of the bill, a question. I have concluded all that I have to say with reference to section 11, which authorizes the creation of a private corporation to carry on the business whether through operation or charter or lease. I understand the committee amendments to section 11 have not been adopted.

Mr. FLETCHER. No amendments have been acted upon at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the Senator whether he would prefer that I submit my amendment, which seeks to strike out section 11, at this time or whether he would rather I would withhold the amendment until the committee amendments are acted upon?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the usual course is to perfect the bill by action upon the committee amendments and then after that is done other amendments are in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator would rather that I should pursue that course?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will do so.

Then, Mr. President, I move forward for just a few moments to another feature of the bill. I come to those parts of the bill which begin with and follow section 15. These parts of the bill have nothing to do with the shipping board as an owner of ships or as a charterer or lessor of ships, nor have they anything to do with the powers of the corporation in these respects. The bill, beginning with and following section 15, is an adaptation of the interstate commerce law applied to commerce on the high seas or foreign commerce, and applied also to commerce upon the Great Lakes.

It will not be doubted, I am sure, and certainly it will not be disputed that sections 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, and 22 are regulations of foreign commerce. If there is any question about that proposition I would be glad if it were made now. I repeat that these sections are attempts to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is one of the most accomplished lawyers in this body. I do not believe that there is any Senator upon whose judgment with respect to questions of law I have greater reliance than upon his. I ask him this question. He is familiar with the sections I have referred to. Does the Senator from Georgia believe that we can impose the regulations there prescribed upon foreign ships?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator will not feel that he has simply captured me by his courteous introduction to his question, but I am obliged to admit to him that I have doubted very much the wisdom of those provisions.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator displays his usual candor and fairness.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been sent for by the Finance Committee again for a moment. I hope to get back soon.

Mr. CUMMINS. I emphasize his implied conclusion. I am sure, guided by the learning of the law, that we can not impose these regulations upon foreign ships. That is not to say that we could not exclude foreign ships from our ports or attach conditions to their entry to our commerce. I do not question our power in that respect. I assert, however, that if a foreign ship were to engage in the commerce of the United States with a foreign country and were to violate any one of these provisions there could be no conviction under this law. We might, therefore, just as well admit and continue the further examination of this subject, with the understanding that these regulations can not be and will not be imposed upon the foreign ships which carry our commerce to other lands or that bring the products of other lands to our shores. I admit freely our power to impose these regulations upon American ships, and if these sections become a law American ships must obey the provisions here found, and, I assume, will obey them.

What, then, is the situation? We were talking, a few moments ago, I was about to say, Mr. President, but it may have been longer than that, time passes so quickly here that I take no note of its flight—we were talking a little while ago with regard to the conditions which prevail as between foreign ships and American ships, and we all agreed that the American ships were already under such burdens that they could not successfully compete with their foreign rivals. Every Senator, every intelligent citizen of the United States knows that to be true; yet what do you propose in this bill? You propose a system of rigorous regulation, the imposition of many additional burdens upon the American ship from which the foreign ship will be absolutely free.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator. I wish the Senator would develop—I have not had the pleasure of listening to all that he has said—if he has not already done so, what the necessary effect would be of port regulations of this kind on foreign shipping? We depend for our export trade on privileges in foreign markets for our own shipping, conceding that we should develop proper shipping facilities of our own. If we impose upon foreign shipping coming to our ports, the provisions found in this bill, such as fines, the attachment of shipping, the confinement in port, thus disturbing the schedules of sailing and the delivery of merchandise at other points, what would be the natural effect of such regulations when other powers began to deal with our shipping abroad, if we should develop it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the natural effect and the inevitable effect would be reprisal, of course; but I am not emphasizing that phase of the subject now. I am assuming that there would be no reprisals. I have said, and I repeat, that these regulations can not be imposed upon foreign ships. Although by the terms of the act foreign ships are included, every lawyer knows, and everyone else familiar with the subject knows, that they could not be and would not be imposed upon foreign ships. You will have then prepared for the American public this astonishing and unprecedented situation: Here are two rivals, two competitors. The American ship represents one and the foreign ship represents the other. The American ship is already staggering under the burden of unfavorable and unfortunate conditions; the foreign ship is free. We can barely put a single ship on the ocean under those conditions now.

I am speaking, of course, of normal times. Yet with the handicap that our ships already suffer, it is proposed by this bill to institute a system of regulation and restriction upon the weak, to which the strong need not yield, and will not yield. Instead of adding an additional burden, if I may use the language of the race track, for the fast horse, in endeavoring to equalize the race, if it is a handicap race, you are adding additional weight to the slow horse. In the language of the game with which I am most familiar, and in which I sometimes indulge, instead of giving some odds to the weak player in golf, you are giving those odds to the strong player on the greens. Who ever heard of an arrangement of that sort for the encouragement or the equalization of commerce or of any other business?

Senators, you are disobeying, and disobeying for the first time in the history of the world, the fundamental principle of Government regulation. It is this: When this or any other nation regulates commerce in order to protect its people, its regulation must fall alike upon all competitors. Who ever heard of regulating one competitor and allowing another to escape? Who would think of attempting to regulate one railway in the United States, and allowing all the others to do as they pleased? It is—and I say it with all deference to my friends upon the other side—the most indefensible and inexcusable proposal I ever heard.

If you could put these regulations upon foreign ships as well as upon American ships, I would say nothing about their wisdom; there is but one of them concerning which I would complain at all.

They are all good in and of themselves, all save one; but you can not hamper our commerce by these regulations, even if now and then a wrong is perpetrated, unless you can bring the competitors of our ships under the same rules and restrictions. Instead of developing commerce, instead of enlarging the merchant marine, you are hastening to destroy what little we have. Therefore I intend to move, Mr. President, to strike out these sections; and I earnestly hope that my Democratic friends, who are moved by the very same purpose that actuates me, who want to accomplish the same things I desire to accomplish, will receive that suggestion with favor, and will eliminate these proposals of regulation upon foreign commerce.

Now, mark you, I will not seek to strike out the regulations which have been imposed upon interstate commerce, for with regard to that commerce we can lay our hand upon all of the vessels engaged in it alike.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator means in the domestic ports—the coastwise trade.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; so far as we can control that commerce, I am entirely willing to bring it under the regulation of the board; I think it ought to have been done long ago; but when it is attempted to strangle a commerce that we are seeking to encourage and to promote, I can not but raise my voice in protest against it. I will not make the motion now, because, under the suggestion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], a more appropriate time will come after the committee amendments are disposed of.

I shall have one further amendment to offer to this bill. If my former amendment is not successful, I shall move to strike out of section 16, beginning with line 18, on page 17, and concluding with line 3, on page 18. This is the part of the bill which repeals the antitrust laws as to all matters over which the shipping board is given jurisdiction.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that the antitrust law simply prohibits a restraint of trade. It prohibits nothing more; it prohibits nothing that encourages trade; it prohibits nothing that tends to build up commerce through competition; and to strike down the antitrust law with reference to commerce or transportation by water and substitute the unrestricted and unguided judgment of a shipping board for the standard of the antitrust law, is more, I think, than the calm and considerate temper of the American people will allow. You can not do it; even now you can not affect all foreign commerce with the antitrust law. Suppose that three ships in Germany combine with each other in such a way as if the combination were made in America, it would be a violation of the antitrust law. That sort of combination can be made, not only in harmony with the law of Germany, but, under some circumstances, the law of Germany commands that course of combination. They do business with America. We can not reach them; we have never pretended to reach them; we have only attempted to control our own affairs. If it were proposed simply to modify some of the rigors of the antitrust law, undoubtedly many Senators would agree with the proposal, but you strike down the entire antitrust law with respect to all commerce of the United States by water. I hope it will not be done. If we repeal the antitrust law, let us substitue at least some rule of law to guide the shipping board in determining what combination, what conspiracies, what agreements are in the public interest and for the public good. Do not set them at large to use their unbridled or unregulated discretion with respect to such an important and vital matter.

These are the three amendments, Mr. President, which, when the proper time comes, I intend to offer. I have discussed them at this time because, notwithstanding the rather depressing atmosphere which prevailed when I began my argument, I still have some hope that there will be real consideration of this measure and of the objections which have been made to it. I hope from the bottom of my heart that the public interest, the public welfare, will so occupy the minds and hearts of the Senators upon the majority side of this Chamber that they will forget that this bill was ever discussed or ever considered in any other place than the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the bill never was discussed in a Democratic conference; it has never been before a Democratic conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia knows better than I as to that, but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There were features of the bill which were discussed, but the bill as a whole never was before a Democratic conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia will remember that a year ago it became the subject of caucus action, and certain Democratic Senators asserted their views as against the caucus action. Something happened this year to change the bill so that the Senators who were then opposed to it have become at least reconciled to it. That could only happen through a conference of some sort.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa leaves the Chamber, I wish to qualify a statement I made a few moments ago, that this bill had not in any sense been considered in a Democratic conference. I am mistaken about that. There was no action upon it, but there was some discussion of its features during the present session in a Democratic conference. The fact had escaped my recollection, and I stated the contrary so positively that I was not willing for the Senator from Iowa to leave without my qualifying the statement. As I have said, it merely escaped my recollection that such a proceeding took place.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had no other information save that which I have received from the newspapers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I knew that I had been in a conference discussing it, but I did not remember that it was in a Democratic conference where all participated.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. ROBINSON. Out of order and by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask leave to report, with an amendment, Senate joint resolution 165, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Secretary read the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) for the relief of the flood sufferers in West Virginia.

Mr. PENROSE. What amount does the resolution carry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution carries $100,000, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. PENROSE. Is there any qualification as to the expenditure of the money or is it a pure gift?

Mr. CHILTON. Let the joint resolution be read.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) for the relief of the flood sufferers in West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he add a provision that the report to Congress shall be made at the beginning of the next session.

Mr. CHILTON. I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not intend to object to the consideration of this joint resolution, Mr. President. The reckless and lavish appropriations made by the present Congress have bankrupted the Treasury, notwithstanding any revenue bill that may pass, and the minority certainly are not responsible for this condition; and as far as I am concerned the merry dance can go on. It is a fairly good campaign contribution to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, nothing that I have ever done in the Senate or anywhere else in my life deserves such a remark as that from the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I firmly believe that there is not another man in public life who was ever associated with me who would seriously make that remark.

It is a very sad duty, Mr. President, for us to approach questions of this kind out of a sense of duty, to relieve little children, to relieve suffering women and poor men, workingmen, miners who are thrust into this sad situation by the act of God. It is very hard for us to come to the Congress with these things, even under those sad circumstances and under such high promptings of duty. I think the remarks of the Senator yesterday and to-day are entirely out of order; but I will leave those remarks to the country, and I would be willing to submit them even to his own constituents.

Mr. President, I should like to put in the RECORD, without reading, some telegrams from officials and others in the State of West Virginia showing the further extent of this flood; and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the telegrams will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegrams are as follows:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 14, 1916.

Senator W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Have been on the ground and personally know at least 2,500 people in Boone County homeless and destitute. Conditions horrible. I know little of conditions in Kanawha, except Cabin Creek is absolutely devastated. Griffithville I understand to be washed out. Will take $500,000 to replace our people where they were. The people are camping in the open on high ground without housing or tents.

WM. OSBORNE,
United States Marshal.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 14, 1916.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

On Wednesday, August 9, 1916, the greatest calamity which has ever occurred to the people of West Virginia befell the miners and residents of Cabin Creek, Paint Creek, Big and Little Coal Rivers, and tributaries in the counties of Kanawha and Boone, this State, caused by a cloudburst, thereby flooding the entire valleys of the respective streams, causing the death of no less than 100 men, women, and children and property damage inestimable. From 30,000 to 35,000 people live in these flooded districts, and practically all who survive have been rendered poverty stricken, homeless, penniless, and helpless. The State of West Virginia and the people of the State are rendering all the aid available at their hands, but the aid is inadequate and insufficient to satisfy the great demand of the sufferers. Sanitary conditions are of the most deplorable nature and demand immediate attention. I have personally witnessed the above conditions. Answer.

HENRY E. PAYNE,
President the Young Men's Business Club.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 14, 1916.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a mass meeting to-night of the citizens of Charleston a resolution was unanimously adopted commending your efforts in the United States Senate to secure Federal assistance to relieve the suffering of thousands of homeless and destitute people on Cabin Creek and Coal River. Local help, while generous, has not been sufficient to meet the needs of a large and homeless population, and while valiant efforts have been made, the situation is such as to demand the attention of the Federal Government. Miles and miles of fertile valleys have been swept clean by the cloudburst and millions of property damage suffered. You can not impress your colleagues in the Senate and the House of Representatives too forcibly of the urgent request for assistance.

L. E. SMITH,
Chairman Citizens Relief Committee.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 14, 1916.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

It is my opinion that $100,000 would go far toward relieving the necessities of the people on Cabin Creek and Coal River. While many are in need of food, the demand is for the necessities of housekeeping and clothing, that the man of the house may be able to work. The operators on Cabin Creek are doing all they can to relieve the suffering, and are giving employment to all their men rebuilding their plants, though their loss is enormous.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 15, 1916.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The homeless people of Coal River and Cabin Creek are praying that your bill asking for $200,000 will pass. It will take at least $500,000 to take care of these homeless people until they can manage to care for themselves. But with the aid of our people, we can take care of the balance. It will be a godsend for these people if Congress will appropriate $200,000. The destitute and suffering is more than can be described. It will be impossible for our people to raise sufficient funds to take care of these people until they can help themselves. I feel sure that the Senate and Congress of the United States will be patriotic enough to respond to these needy and suffering people.

SAMUEL STEPHENSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word before this matter is voted upon.

I have not favored these appropriations, as a rule; but the Senator from West Virginia detailed to the Committee on Appropriations a condition that exists in that State as a result of this visitation that touched my heart very deeply, and inasmuch as we have been making appropriations of a similar nature, I felt very strongly that this joint resolution ought to pass.

I hope, however, that after a while we will take up this whole subject and see whether or not it is wise for the Congress to make appropriations whenever a calamity of this kind occurs in any part of the country.

Mr. PENROSE. These appropriations will cease when the rainy season is over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has made a statement with which I concur. The evidence before the Committee on Appropriations disclosed an appalling situation in West Virginia, and one which, in the opinion of the committee, calls for immediate action. In that view of the matter the committee made it an emergency proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I hope that in the providence of God our people may be spared the devastation of floods and the horrible ravages of the pestilence; but God forbid that the time shall ever come when Congress will refuse to respond promptly to the call of the needy for help. The people—our masters—whose toil produces the money that we appropriate to meet the wants of the unfortunate, if consulted, would heartily approve the donation. There is no extravagance in charity and no wastefulness in helping those whom misfortune has rendered unable to help themselves.

I sincerely trust that this joint resolution may be agreed to at once. Promptness of action on the part of the Senate will give a flavor to our deeds that will add to the satisfaction and sense of gratitude of those who receive, that joy which the spirit of love always brings the sorrowing heart.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, the committee proposes to strike out the numerals "$200,000" and to insert "$100,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] offers the following amendment: On page 1, line 14, after the word "Congress," to insert "at the beginning of the next session," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of persons suffering by reason of the recent floods on the waters of the Kanawha, Mud, and Coal Rivers in West Virginia. The Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe from time to time, is authorized to expend said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in relieving destitution and caring for the injured and homeless who are suffering from the result of said flood and providing sanitary conditions, and he shall keep accounts of his expenditures hereunder and shall report the same to Congress at the beginning of the next session, and shall, as far as possible, cooperate with local and State authorities and relief associations and organizations; and he may use any Army tents, equipment, or supplies which he may deem proper in affording adequate and immediate relief.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15522) to establish a national-park service, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2, with an amendment as follows: "except that this provision shall not apply to the Yellowstone National Park."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

H. L. MYERS,
C. S. THOMAS,
REED SMOOT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
WM. L. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that all that there is in the report is a change in the provision as to grading in the Yellowstone National Park, which in the amendment agreed to by the conferees is prohibited, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] requested.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the conference report be adopted.

The report was agreed to.

CHARLESTON & NORFOLK STEAMSHIP CO.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 249. It is simply a resolution requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to reopen a case. All the members of the committee have signed a favorable report upon the resolution, and it is simply a request for reopening the case for hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution be read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is reporting the resolution from the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; and I should say that there are two amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the resolution is on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; it is not on the calendar; it is just reported and from the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is on the calendar I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is not on the calendar. It is just reported. I saw the members of the committee, and they are all favorable to the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the resolution be reported.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 8, page 3, after the word "that," strike out the words "an opinion" and insert "a decision"; and in line 9, after the words "Interstate Commerce Commission," strike out "as to whether or not the proportional rates prayed for by the petitioner will or will not be granted in advance of the actual purchase of the steamships," so as to make the resolution read:

Whereas the Charleston & Norfolk Steamship Co., a corporation duly empowered by charter from the State of South Carolina to acquire, by purhcase or otherwise, steamships and operate the same as common carriers; and

Whereas said company petitioned the Interstate Commerce Commission to put into effect certain proportional rates from Cincinnati, Louisville, and so forth, to Norfolk and Newport News on traffic destined to Charleston, S. C., such proportional now being applied by aforesaid railway companies in connection with rail lines leading south into Carolina territory; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission, in an opinion dated June 30, 1916 (docket No. 8081), dismissed said petition on the ground that the petitioner was not a common carrier; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the Flour City Steamship Co. against The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. (Interstate Commerce Commission Rept. No. 24, pp. 179 to 186), defined the status of a common carrier by water, such as proposes to operate under nondiscriminatory traffic arrangements, in specific terms; and

Whereas the position of the Charleston & Norfolk Steamship Co. is the same as that of the Flour Steamship Co., in that said company can not afford to make enormous expenditures in equipment pending a decision as to whether or not it is entitled to the nondiscriminatory traffic arrangements with the rail carriers leading into Norfolk; and

Whereas, subsequent to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Flour City Steamship Co. case, the act to regulate commerce has been further strengthened by the passage of the Panama Canal act, under date of August 24, 1912, which empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish proportional rates over rail lines when property may be or is transported to or from port by rail carriers; and

Whereas this act confers additional powers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to those it exercised when the Flour City case was decided; and

Whereas the Charleston & Norfolk Steamship Co. has been organized by the merchants of Charleston for the express purpose of bringing relief from an unduly discriminatory rate adjustment and for affording an economical means of transportation; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its decision in the Flour City case, established the principle that the company was entitled to a decision on the merits of the case before the said company made large expenditures in equipment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to initiate an investigation upon its own motion and, in conjunction with this proceeding, reopen the case of the Charleston & Norfolk Steamship Co. against The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co. and others (docket No. 8081), and give all parties an opportunity to submit any further testimony or arguments and that a decision be rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if this is a Senate resolution?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is a Senate resolution, simply calling for the reopening of a case.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it competent for the Senate, acting in an individual capacity and ignoring the other branch of Congress, to instruct——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is not an instruction. It is simply a request. It was put in that form, because the conditions have already been complied with in Charleston, and it was simply to ask an expedition of this work.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very sure this ought to be a joint resolution, and for that reason I shall object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, a little while ago I objected to the consideration of the resolution presented by the Senator from South Carolina. If no other Senator feels that the resolution is not in good form, I am not going to put my judgment against that of the Senator from South Carolina, and I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senate will proceed to consider the resolution as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee, which have been stated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before we adjourn I desire, just to meet some of the arguments that have been urged on the other side with reference to the pending bill, wherein particularly it was claimed that there was no expression of opinion from any responsible source in favor of this bill, to ask to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD three editorials from the Washington Post and an editorial from the Coast Seamen's Journal, the last editorial being dated August 9, as bearing on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of May 17, 1916.]

THE COUNTRY DEMANDS THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

The bill for creating an American merchant marine is before the House of Representatives, and the people of the United States expect the Members of the House and of the Senate to do their duty to them and to the Republic by establishing that long-promised marine.

For 32 years of Republican control of Federal power and for eight quadrennial periods of promises to establish a merchant marine for the Nation those promises were not fulfilled.

For an equally long period of Democratic pledges for a merchant marine and eight years of Democratic control of Federal power all the results the American people had were the unfulfilled promises of the party.

It has been a long period of national subordination upon the high seas, a long period of supremacy in facilities of trade for our commercial rivals, and the Republic of the United States was rendered a debtor Nation for half a century largely by this long and grievously felt want of ocean transportation under the Stars and Stripes.

The past two years have so plainly disclosed the absolute necessity of this marine to the great masses of the people of the United States that they are now united as never before, urgent as never before, determined as never before to have that marine established, and they now ask the Congress to provide that marine as a national necessity to the maintenance of the country's prosperity.

They call for it in no partisan spirit, but with a patriotic purpose.

They realize the extent of the losses that agriculturists, miners, manufacturers of the United States have sustained during the past two years would have paid for construction of ten times the vessels that can be provided with the appropriation proposed in the pending measure.

They know, and Members of the House and the Senate know, that the want of a United States merchant marine is costing the people of this country millions of dollars every week at the present time.

The subtle influences which have paralyzed legislation in the past upon this question can not again prevail as against the demands of an aroused public sentiment.

It will not do for Senators and Representatives to face the farmers and the planters this autumn and while their products are rotting in our ports or congested in the warehouses and railway terminals for lack of vessels to carry them to destined ports abroad; it will not do for them to meet these constituents with a record of "no" against the shipping bill.

The miners demand vessels for their outputs and vessels they can depend upon for steady service at reasonable and fair rates.

The manufacturers and the millions of their operatives will not consent to be thwarted again by open or concealed opposition of vessel owners or financial and shipping agents with foreign connections in their efforts to obtain vessels to carry the outputs of the mills, the shops, the factories of the United States.

There is a wave of Americanism sweeping this country from ocean to ocean that calls for the placing of this country in finance, agriculture, industry, and commerce above and beyond ever other nation on the earth, and this can not be accomplished without the creation of an American merchant marine.

For more than 40 years our commercial competitors have had the advantage over this country through their control of ocean transportation.

We impugn the motives of no man in public life; we reflect upon no man who deems it his duty to oppose this measure which we believe so essential to the welfare of the people of the United States; but every vote in opposition to it will receive the hearty approval of the shipping combines of Great Britain, France, and Germany, and of every manufacturer in those countries who will have to compete with our own manufacturers in the markets of the world.

Every vote for the establishment of a merchant marine is a vote for America first.

Every vote for the establishment of a merchant marine is a vote to develop the resources and the commerce of the United States.

Every vote for the establishment of a merchant marine is a vote for making of our ports the centers of a mighty commercial power and influence.

Every vote for the establishment of a merchant marine is a vote for the prosperity of the more than 100,000,000 of people now under the Stars and Stripes.

Every vote for the establishment of the merchant marine, whether that vote is cast by a Republican, a Progressive, or a Democrat, is a vote to redeem party promises made by all parties to the electors of the Union.

WAR RISK PROFITS.

The chief complaint against the Government ship purchase bill has always been that it would eventually bring financial losses to the United States Government, in addition to the loss of $50,000,000 originally invested. The same prediction was made against the establishment of the bureau of war risk insurance, established by Congress two years ago, when the war sent marine insurance rates to a prohibitive point.

Private insurance companies were so fearful of the financial danger involved in giving insurance that in many cases they refused to take any risk at any price. The Government had courage enough to meet the emergency, and it is now announced that after two years of operation the bureau has made a profit of more than $2,000,000.

There have been issued 1,537 policies, covering $138,392,389, on American cargoes and ships carrying contraband goods.

Figures compiled recently show that the gross premiums for insurance issued amounted to $2,904,866, on which losses had been $771,329, of which $58,811 was recovered in salvage.

The bureau now has at risk $12,325,198. The bureau will expire by limitation September 2, but Secretary McAdoo has indicated that he will ask Congress to extend its life to the war's close. Mr. McAdoo echoes the general sentiment with respect to the war risk bureau when he says:

"It has been of incalculable benefit to the business of the country. It has afforded insurance where it was unobtainable from other sources and has reduced war risk insurance rates generally to a reasonable and equitable basis."

The country should learn by experience. The proposal of the Government in connection with the ship-purchase bill is very similar to the proposal that was involved in the establishment of the war risk insurance bureau. Ocean freight rates, like insurance rates, have been abnormally high. The results of the venture will be the same—a lowering of freight rates and the establishment of adequate shipping facilities.

THE MERCHANT MARINE CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT IS VITAL TO THE INTERESTS OF THE PEOPLE.

It is to the interests of 99 per cent of the 105,000,000 of people in the United States that a merchant marine under governmental control of routes and rates be established.

It is to the interest of every agriculturist that this be done so that the products of the lands he cultivates can be placed at reasonable rates for transportation in the markets of foreign countries so that he may be able to hold those markets as against foreign competitors.

It is to the interest of every agriculturist that vessels shall at all times be available for the transport of the products which represent his time, capital, labor, skill, and energy, and which may largely be reduced in values through lack of vessels.

On the cotton crop of 1914 the planters of the South through lack of available vessels lost hundreds of millions of dollars, and on the 1915 crop, from the first bale to the last bale produced, the price of their cotton has suffered through scarcity of vessels and through the limitation of their markets by the failure of this administration to compel Great Britain to abandon its unjust barriers to our commerce with other neutral countries of the world.

Our foreign commerce, great as it is to-day, can be largely increased after the war, provided this Republic is in position to maintain commercial fleets upon the ocean.

Here is a preparedness that is a necessity in either peace or war, and with this preparedness of a Government-controlled merchant marine this country can maintain its present prosperity, while without it, without the vessels that the Government can control, our foreign trade and our home prosperity will be in the hands of our commercial competitors.

It is not unpatriotic for private capital controlling ocean vessels to merge, combine, or otherwise agree with foreign corporations upon rates that shall be charged or routes that shall be run or not run in order to increase its profits.

Such mergers, combines, or arrangements may be made legally, and it is within the rights of private capital to enter into them for profit, but it is folly for the Government of a great agricultural, industrial, and commercial nation as this is to leave its people and their prosperity subject to such uncontrolled and unregulated ocean transportation.

The manufacturers of the United States and the millions of our people dependent upon the profitable activity of our industries can no more be secure and safe in their business interests while at the mercy of an uncontrolled and unregulated merchant marine subject to merger, combine, and direction of British, German, or French shipping syndicates than they would be dependent upon uncontrolled and unregulated railway lines controlled by commercial competitors.

The Government control and regulation of the merchant marine which is to be established is as necessary to the interests of the people of this Republic as is the merchant marine itself, and both are vital to the prosperity and the progress of the Nation.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS.

The failure of Congress to act upon the administration shipping bill in September, 1914, and appropriate $40,000,000 for the purchase of merchant ships "was a fatal and irretrievable mistake," says the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo.

From the point of view of dollars and cents there can be no dispute with Mr. McAdoo's assertion. If the amount stated had been available in the fall of 1914 or the early part of 1915, merchant vessels could have been purchased at $40 to $60 per gross ton and the same vessels could be sold to-day for at least double the investment. In addition these vessels could have earned fifty to one hundred million dollars of net revenue, while at the same time carrying American products for the farmer, the manufacturer, and the business man at one-third of the existing extortionate ocean freight rates.

But this is only one story of "what might have been." It is but the logical and natural sequence of paying too much attention to selfish interests masquerading through chambers of commerce and similar organizations. Of course, the necessity for the creation of an American merchant marine for the regulation of ocean freight rates and for the establishment of a shipping board is just as imperative now as it was then. Acting upon this theory the House of Representatives has finally passed such a bill, carrying with it an appropriation of $50,000,000 for the construction and purchase by the Government of a merchant marine, to be utilized both as an essential naval auxiliary in time of war and for commerce in time of peace.

Strange to relate, however, there still remains persistent and apparently implacable opposition to the shipping-board proposal. The five-year limitation on Government ownership embodied in the pending bill does not, in view of opponents of the measure, compensate for the intended permanency of its supervisory and regulatory features. Federal "meddling" with the ship industry, it is held, will discourage investment of private capital in shipbuilding.

To state the case briefly, private interests, as distinguished from public interests, object to any sort of meddling. And, it should be said in passing, the same private interests which are solely responsible for delaying action upon this measure were also wholly responsible for the many years' delay in the enactment of the seamen's law. Private interests claimed all along that any legislation giving freedom to seamen and providing for greater safety of life at sea constituted noxious and objectionable meddling with "their business."

Fortunately Congress finally decided that public interests were of considerable importance in any consideration of the shipping industry, so called. The result was the enactment of the long pending seamen's bill.

To-day all the world knows how all the gloomy predictions about the results of that law have come to naught. All the world knows that American shipowners who opposed it and American newspapers which lied about it were not actuated by motives of patriotism. Neither cared a rap about an American-manned merchant marine; to the contrary, all they wanted was the continued privilege to operate so-called American ships, manned exclusively by the cheapest alien labor.

It is to be hoped that the fatuous reasoning of private interests will not much longer prevent action upon the Government shipping bill. The Commonwealth of Australia has just shown the way by the purchase of 15 modern cargo steamships to be operated by and for the Australian people in carrying the great harvest of wheat to Europe. The people of the Antipodes aim to strike a blow at the war profiteers who have so badly overreached themselves in their eagerness to amass wealth. And the people of our own great Republic can ill afford to much longer remain the willing sheep ever ready for another shearing by unrestrained and uncontrolled private shipping interests.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, I will state also that there have been numerous letters received and communications and petitions from responsible sources in this connection. I will not weary the Senate with reading them, nor shall I ask to have them all included in the RECORD; but I should like to submit an extract from a letter which came this morning to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the subcommittee reporting the bill, to this effect:

I am very much in hopes that the bill you have in hand will be passed, as Heaven knows we need bottoms bad enough, both in foreign and coastwise shipping.

Yours, respectfully,

PUGET SOUND LUMBER CO.,
By E. V. WINTERMOTE, Secretary-Treasurer.

In addition to that, I want to insert in the RECORD a communication from the National Business League of America, under date of June 9, 1916.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NATIONAL BUSINESS LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
Chicago, June 9, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The National Business League of America, an organization which has had 20 years of active and resultful work, and which numbers among its members many of America's best and most unselfish business men, submits to you its views on the bill known as H. R. 15455, recently passed by the House of Representatives and now before your honorable body.

The league submits, first of all, the nonpartisan efforts of two decades to improve the condition of our country, through national legislation, especially such as vitally affects general business interests. Its work in the reorganization of the Consular Service on the merit system, creation of the Department of Commerce, irrigation of the arid lands of the West, and the Federal reserve law are some of its important activities, which undoubtedly are familiar to many of the Members of the Senate. It has enjoyed the confidence of every national administration from President McKinley down to the present time, because its work has always been for the benefit of all the people.

One of the most important of its activities has been to impress the Congress, business men, and the public in general with the fact that our scant merchant marine has always lacked sufficient tonnage to adequately serve our Navy in time of war and to help carry the commerce of our mines, our factories, and our farms to distant parts of the world. It has, therefore, noted with satisfaction the work of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives in connection with the introduction and passage of the above-mentioned bill as initiative in the right direction, and while it admits there are imperfections in the bill, it feels that its enactment would tend more toward a greater preparedness than any measure introduced in the Houses of Congress during the past 50 years.

As you gentlemen are no doubt aware, the bill provides, first of all, for the establishment of a United States shipping board. There is no difference of opinion, the league believes, on this point. It provides that in addition to the five commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce shall be ex officio members. The league heartily favors this provision, for the reason that the executive duties of these officials will practically interlock with the work of the shipping board—the Secretary of the Navy by reason of the fact that these merchant ships are to be auxiliaries of the Navy; that they are to be used also for the purpose of building up a naval reserve; and that some of the military transports not now used by the Navy will be transferred to the shipping board; the Secretary of Commerce by reason of the fact that he is in charge of the Bureau of Navigation, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Lighthouse and Life-Saving Services, and probably many of his officials will be needed to advise with the shipping board.

The provision, section 5, whereby "the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to have constructed and equipped in American shipyards and navy yards or elsewhere, giving preference, other things being equal, to domestic yards, or to purchase, lease, or charter, vessels suitable, as far as the commercial requirements of the marine trade of the United States may permit, for use as naval auxiliaries or Army transports, or for other naval or military purposes," coupled with the further provision of section 14 that "for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 5 and 11 the Secretary of the Treasury, upon request of the board, approved by the President, shall from time to time issue and sell or use any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury under the acts of August 5, 1909, February 4, 1910, and March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $50,000,000," will give the Nation the opportunity it has never had since the Civil War of establishing the nucleus for a merchant marine.

Arguments have been advanced against the Government investing $50,000,000 in ships at this time for the reason that prices are too high. No sincere advocate of preparedness from the standpoint of national defense and the safeguarding of our commercial prosperity could consistently urge any such argument, for the reason that these ships are to be used for two purposes—for carrying a greater portion of our over-sea commerce (and everyone admits that there is great need for this purpose) and, secondly, as auxiliaries for the use of the Navy. No one would vote against the Government building or purchasing battleships because prices are too high; and as these ships are in a sense as important as battleships, it must be apparent that this argument of high prices should not be used at all. Aside from this, the probability is that the prices of ships will be higher before they will be lower, and we need ships now for both the above-stated purposes and have no right to oppose the purchase or construction of these ships because some one may think prices are too high.

The point raised that these ships could not be purchased or constructed at this time is also one that should have no bearing on the proposition, for the Government will find the same difficulty in building naval ships, which must be built in shipyards, that it would find in having merchant ships built, and the sooner it starts the better, for surely nothing can be gained by waiting. Aside from that, with the great abundance of material that is used in the construction of ships; with the fact that the Nation is back of a movement to build up its merchant fleet; that its shipping board is going to devote its entire time to this purpose, would bring about a greater expansion in shipbuilding in this country. The shipbuilders are a little fearful about this present expansion, because they are not sure whether this movement is temporary or permanent, but with the Government's backing permanency would be assured and shipyards would be greatly enlarged.

It seems almost absurd for anyone to oppose this bill on the ground that it means Government ownership and operation, because there is not the slightest probability of Government operation, and as far as Government ownership is concerned it would be best that the Government did not sell these ships. It does not sell its battleships, it owns them, and in view of the fact that these ships are built with the thought in mind that they may be used to increase naval efficiency, surely it would be better for the Government to own them instead of allowing them to lie idle and rot at the docks; to lease them, or, as a last resort, to sell them on condition, of course, that they can be reclaimed. These ships would be an important addition to any preparedness program. It is undisputed that the half million tons, which is the amount that probably could be purchased for the $50,000,000 invested, are absolutely necessary to properly take care of our present naval fleet, and when we add to that, as we will, more auxiliaries, even more will be necessary.

There are other arguments in favor of the enactment of section 11. The principal one, and in the judgment of the league the strongest (for it believes that the Government will be able to sell or lease all the ships constructed under this act), is that because of the fact that the Government will be paying such a low rate of interest and will not be obliged to pay promotion fees, usually incumbent upon corporations which construct ships, the Government will be able to lease on such favorable terms that there will be a great many more requests for ships than the Government can possibly supply. The league would much prefer that the amendment, whereby the Government is to dispose of its ships in five years, be left out of the bill, for it feels satisfied that if the Government operated such ships that it could not sell or lease, in the event of such contingency these ships could be used in opening up new trade routes or covering such routes where improper service is given to this country, and the Government could also use these ships to prevent the possibility of any unfair competition that would put American shippers out of business, in the event that the second provision of section 15 would not be effective enough.

Probably the most important provision of the bill (although section 12, whereby a naval auxiliary reserve will be built up, is very important) is section 13, which gives the board the right to "investigate the relative cost of building merchant vessels in the United States and in foreign maritime countries, and the relative cost, advantages, and disadvantages of operating in the foreign trade, vessels under United States registry and under foreign registry." It also states that the board "shall examine the navigation laws of the United States and the rules and regulations thereunder and make such recommendations to the Congress as it deems proper for the amendment, improvement, and revision of such laws, and for the development of the American merchant marine," and that it shall also "investigate the legal status of mortgage loans on vessel property, with a view to means of improving the security of such loans and of encouraging investment in American shipping." The league can not conceive of anything more important for the upbuilding of the merchant marine than this section. It has been claimed time and time again that our navigation laws injure our shipping. If that be a fact, this shipping board would be able to ascertain this condition in a much better manner than by the mere acceptance of the statement of any shipper who is interested. Should it be found that there are laws inimical to American shipping, the board's recommendations would unquestionably have great weight with the Congress and repeal would speedily follow. There are also, from time to time, statements made that there are disadvantages in the relative cost of operating and constructing ships. The board can easily make investigations and recommendations in this particular. The board could also formulate plans for the financing and securing of mortgage loans on vessel property, so that American capital would be encouraged to make investments in American shipping.

The league doubts that any one who has made a study of the recent investigation of the Congress in connection with shipping, in so far as it relates to discrimination against American shippers, divulging of trade secrets, retaliation, etc., would oppose any part of section 15, which covers these points. The league also wishes to call attention to the fact that valuable suggestions of the New York Chamber of Commerce have been incorporated in section 15 verbatim.

There are many other important provisions in this bill that might be touched upon, but the league feels that it should not burden you with a too lengthy statement. The league is satisfied, and some of its public-spirited members who are interested have visited many cities of the country and addressed the various chambers of commerce, urging support of the measure, and in not a single case where a chamber of commerce under its by-laws had the right to act on this matter was there a refusal to adopt resolutions favoring the passage of the bill. As a means of preparedness, so far as the Navy of America would be augmented, the league feels that it is also of the most vital importance. What is the use of building more naval ships if we do not have auxiliaries to protect them? Why should we keep the American Nation fettered by its lack of needful facilities in transporting its rapidly expanding commerce when the ready means are at its disposal?

We address this timely appeal to you and ask you to vote and otherwise work for the passage of this important bill, so that favorable action may be unanimous and in no sense partisan. Verily this is a crisis in American affairs, when every man in public and in private life should throw partisanship to the winds and use every endeavor to insure the safety and commercial supremacy of the Nation. In this way we may have effective preparedness.

PHILETUS W. GATES,
President.
BENJ. J. ROSENTHAL,
Vice President.
AUSTIN A. BURNHAM,
General Secretary.

Mr. FLETCHER. In connection further with the observations that have been made that the difference in cost of operating under the American flag and under a foreign flag was of considerable consequence, my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], having offered some letters sustaining his argument and contention in that regard, I want to observe that the letters which he offered and, I think, his argument all applied to conditions as they existed back of 1914. They scarcely apply to conditions as they exist to-day. It will be recalled that the seamen's law went into effect as to our ships in November, 1915, and as to foreign ships in July, 1916. So that this law was not in operation when the letters which the Senator mentioned were submitted to him, and it has not been in operation during the time when these claims of steamship people were made, to the effect that there was this vast difference in the cost of operating under our flag and under foreign flags.

In further support of the fact that that difference in cost has been largely eliminated in recent times, I want to submit a copy of a report made by Mr. Andrew Furuseth, dated August 5, 1916, to Mr. Thomas A. Hansen, secretary-treasurer of the International Seamen's Union of America, giving precisely the wages paid in quite a few of the principal ports of the country, showing exactly what the facts were on May 14, 1916, and August 2, 1916—a comparison of the wages paid.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, have not the wages for May, 1916, been put in the RECORD already?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. This has not been put in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. That particular article may not have been printed; but I will say to the Senator that on several occasions the wages paid to seamen in different ports of the country have been put in the RECORD. It may be a different date and a different month.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know about that; but I know that Mr. Furuseth's thorough knowledge of the situation and the statements made by him, if actually investigated on the ground, ought to be very strong evidence of the facts, and I should be very glad to have them inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator that I put into the RECORD two or three letters that had been written within a week. I want further to say that Mr. Andrew Furuseth is a romancer of the first order. I would not believe anything he wrote concerning shipping.

Mr. FLETCHER. Well, of course, there may be a great many people who differ with the Senator in that regard.

Mr. GALLINGER. He is around here. No doubt he is in the gallery now; but I want him to know my opinion of him.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have never found any statement that Mr. Furuseth made as a statement of fact that was otherwise than as he put it, and I am sure he has the confidence of a great many people who know of him and of his work. But I offer this as evidence of the facts therein stated, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 5, 1916.

Mr. THOMAS A. HANSEN,
Secretary-Treasurer, International Seamen's Union of America, 570 West Lake Street, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR COMRADE: On May 14 I submitted a report upon the progress and development of the seamen's act in certain parts of the country. That report was caused by the claims and complaints of shipowners sent to Senators and Members of Congress, part of which was put into the RECORD some time previous to that by Senator JONES, of Washington.

In order to ascertain the actual facts, I at that time went to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and there investigated the matter for myself, going to the shipping commissioners' offices, the consuls' offices, and the offices of the seamen's unions. With reference to Seattle, Washington, Portland, Oreg., Norfolk, and Newport News, Va., I obtained the information through correspondence. At the beginning of this week I again visited New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore for the purpose of obtaining as accurate information as possible. I communicated with Boston, Norfolk, Newport News, Seattle, Portland, and San Francisco.

In this report I shall quote the previous report giving in each instance the date, and then underneath, also giving the date, I shall state what changes have taken place and what the situation is now.

When the last report was made the treaties with foreign nations were not abrogated. They became abrogated finally, except in the case of Germany, on the last day of July. This, however, did not prevent the foreign freight vessels from being profoundly affected by the passage of the seamen's law; but so far as the regular line passenger vessels were concerned, they were at the time of the last report not very materially affected, and they are not very materially affected as yet. The wages on board of those passenger vessels have risen in European ports in some instances practically up to the American standard, but the war must be assigned as the cause of this. The real difficulty now is the question of the language clause of section 13. Unfortunately the department sent out a circular, known as Circular 265, to which the department gives one construction, namely, that the men must understand all orders, emergency as well as ordinary orders, and that the official who musters the crew has a right to satisfy himself that the crew actually does understand the emergency orders, and for this purpose he may suggest any orders or questions that he may think necessary. The collectors, however, do not so understand the circular; they understand it to mean that ordinary orders, given under ordinary conditions, are all that is needed. They further understand the circular to prohibit them from suggesting orders or questions that would bring out the real facts as to whether the men know the language of the officers or not. The collectors of New York and San Francisco have sent inquiries into the department, and I understand that they have been given, at least partially, the construction placed upon the circular by the department itself, but I further understand that no copies of such correspondence have been sent to other collectors. As a result of this foreign vessels are coming to New York with Lascar (Hindu) seamen. Other vessels are coming to New York, Philadelphia, Galveston, and Port Arthur with Chinese and Lascars and other seamen who do not understand the language of the officers on the ship on which they are serving.

There has been considerable improvement since May 14, as you will see.

"BOSTON, May 14, 1916.

"I inquired from Percy J. Pryor, secretary seamen's union, and the United States Shipping Commissioner about wages in American vessels, and I was informed that the majority of American vessels pay $45 per month to sailors, $50 per month to firemen, 40 cents per hour overtime, and if they go into the war zone, 25 per cent of the wages in addition. There are some exceptions to this, such as the American coastwise line, known as the Merchants & Miners' Line. I visited the English and the Norwegian consulates and found that Norwegian and English vessels shipping men in Boston pay $45 to sailors, and sometimes $45 and sometimes $50 to firemen. The seamen of English vessels remain with their vessels more than usually. Most of the English vessels come directly from England, and the wages in England range from $40 to $50 per month; that is, from £8 to £10. The equalization here, of course, arises from the war. The seamen's act is not in full operation, or if it is with reference to British ships it has been so for such a short time that it has not seriously affected the condition."

"BOSTON, August 2, 1916.

"Have just received your note dated July 31, and hasten to answer. Wages for sailors, quartermasters, and boatswains are $45, $50, and $55, respectively, in the following lines: Eastern Steamship Co., Gulf Refining Co., Texas Oil Co., Standard Oil Co., Mexican Petroleum Co., Clyde Line (from Boston), Savannah Line, American Molasses Co., Crowell & Thurlew, Shawmur Steamship Co., New England Gas & Coke Co., and all transient coal carriers and outside tug boats.

"The Cuban Distilling Co., three ships, pay sailors, $50; quartermasters, $55; boatswains, $65.

"The Merchant & Miners' and Coastwise Transportation Co. pay sailors, $40; quartermasters and boatswains, $45.

"The above in every instance applies to the firemen. In paragraph No. 1, firemen receive $50; oilers and water tenders, $55; coal passers, $42.50.

"Paragraph 2. Firemen, $50; oilers and water tenders, $55; Merchants & Miners', firemen, $45; oilers and water tenders, $50; Coastwise Transportation Co., firemen, $50; oilers and water tenders, $55. The White Star and Leyland, with a Cunard ship, about every two weeks, are the principal foreign liners, the wages from England is £9, with a bonus of £1.

"Danish ships are paying 70 crowns, with a bonus of 70 crowns. On all ships from Boston that leave the war zone they pay $45, and in many instances $50 and 25 per cent bonus.

"Have heard of no arrivals with coolie crews.

"There are a large number of British leaving their ships; very few Scandinavians leave in this port."

"NEW YORK, May 14, 1916.

"Wages paid in New York are $45 to the sailors, $50 to the firemen, 40 cents an hour overtime, and 25 per cent of the wages in addition as a war bonus. These wages are paid in full by the following lines: Morgan Line (coastwise), Savannah Line (coastwise), Grace Line (foreign going), United Fruit Co. (foreign and coastwise), the different oil companies (foreign and coastwise), the American Line (foreign).

"The following companies pay these wages to some men and in some vessels; less to some men and in some vessels: Ward Line (coastwise and to Cuba) (subsidized), Clyde and Mallory Lines (coastwise), Old Dominion Line (coastwise), Luckenback (coastwise and foreign), American-Hawaiian (coastwise and foreign), Panama Line (coastwise and foreign), Red "D" Line (South American) (subsidized).

"The following English lines pay the full rate: Lambert & Holt, Bermuda Line, the Prince Line, the Booth Line, and the Union Castle Line. Some of these vessels pay more than the scale quoted above, especially such of them as go to Great Britain.

"Scandinavian and Dutch freight steamers pay the scale as stated above. Scandinavian and Dutch passenger liners have not so far been affected. Section 4, providing for half pay in port, will not apply to any of these nations' vessels until after June 4. The men are inquiring about that section, and they want to know whether it is in operation. Finding that it does not yet apply, they remain with their vessels as a general proposition.

"British passenger lines do not lose many of their men. They pay the scale stated above in filling casual vacancies. Wages out of Great Britain at the present time is about £9 a month from the southern part of England; wages from northeast ports of England run from £10 to £12 per month."

"NEW YORK, August 2, 1916.

"The wages of seamen, quartermasters, and boatswains are, respectively, $45, $50, and $55. The wages of firemen are $50, of oilers $55. These wages are paid by the Morgan Line, the Panama Line, the Old Dominion Line, the Savannah Line, the United States Fruit Line, the Gulf Refining Co., Standard Oil Co. of New York, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, Texas Oil Co., and the International Mercantile Marine. The American-Hawaiian Line, the Luckenback Line, the Ward Line, the Porto Rican Line, the Red "D" Line, and the Clyde and Mallory Lines are paying the above wages to some men on some vessels and in some places, but not generally.

"Foreign and domestic vessels going into the war zone pay the above wages with 25 per cent bonus, and whenever the men are called to work overtime there is 40 cents per hour paid for overtime on the vessels that are paying the wages."

"The men on board of the French, Italian, Holland, Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish regular liners have not up to the present been seriously affected. They have raised their wages at home and comparatively few are leaving those vessels, but whenever any men are leaving they are paid the port wages. The men are demanding and sometimes receiving the pay, the half pay provided under the law. In other cases where they are refused they have collected the full amount of wages due.

"Quite a large number of freighters are coming manned by Lascars or Chinese and nothing is done with them. They go away with the same crew. No musters have been called for fear of establishing a bad precedent, under the operation of circular No. 265."

"PHILADELPHIA, May 14, 1916.

"Nearly all American vessels pay $50 to the firemen, $45 to the sailors, and 40 cents per hour overtime. Exceptions to these are the Clyde Line and the Merchants & Miners' Line, who pay whatever they have to, sometimes $40, sometimes $45 per month.

"Scandinavian, Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish vessels pay the above monthly scale and 25 per cent additional going into the war zone. English vessels pay the same scale, sometimes one-half of the bonus, and then pay off in England. Others pay the full amount and ship to be paid off on return to the United States. A few English vessels succeed in obtaining men for less, especially to fill casual vacancies and there are not very many English deserting."

"PHILADELPHIA, August 2, 1916.

"Wages of seamen, quartermasters, and boatswains, respectively, are $45, $50, and $55; firemen and oilers, respectively, $50 and $55 per month. These wages are paid practically by all foreign and domestic vessels leaving Philadelphia. Some pay overtime, 40 cents per hour; some pay no overtime, but pay higher wages to make up for overtime. Vessels going into the war zone pay 25 per cent bonus. Practically all men going in foreign vessels ask one-half pay and get it. In two cases when the money was refused the men left and obtained all money earned.

"Vessels that do not pay the above wages are the Merchants & Miners' Line and the Clyde Line, both domestic. They sometimes pay the above wages and sometimes not and they pay from some ports and from other ports not.

"The question of language is of serious importance in nearly all of the vessels that do not pay the rate of wages."

"BATIMORE, May 14, 1916.

"The regular scale of wages out of Baltimore is $50 for firemen, $45 for sailors, 40 cents per hour overtime and 25 per cent bonus in going into the war zone. This scale is, however, not paid by the Merchants and Miners Line (coastwise), Luckenback Line (coastwise and foreign), Bull Line (coastwise and foreign). It is paid by the fruit boats, American, Norwegian, and Dutch. It is paid by the oil vessels and by freight vessels going to Europe, except in the vessels belonging to the Caroline Steamship Co. of Baltimore."

"BALTIMORE, August 2, 1916.

"Wages paid at Baltimore are: Sailors, $45; quartermasters, $50; and oilers, $55. Some pay 40 cents overtime and some not. Foreign and domestic vessels pay these wages with 25 per cent bonus for going into the war zone. The Merchants and Miners Line and the Carolina Steamship Co. are not paying these wages regularly. They pay to some men and not to others; in some vessels and not in others. Both these lines are coastwise lines."

"NORFOLK, May 1½, 1916.

"The following is an extract from a letter dated on May 5, 1916, and signed by Dan Ingraham, Seamen's Union Agent at Norfolk:

"'In reply to your inquiry to the equalization of wages in the different nations' ships, I beg to inform you that last week, April 23 to 29, two Norwegian steamers, Alfred Nobel and Kin, shipped both on deck and below (firemen) paying our scale. Russian bark Finland shipped six able seamen, bound for South America, paying the scale. Norwegian bark shipped able seamen, paying the scale. British steamer Lexington shipped sailors and firemen, paying the scale; also British steamer Cheswick and probably some others that were not brought to our attention. * * * All the coastwise ships are now paying the scale with the exception of the Merchants and Miners Line. The Luckenback fleet are paying the scale from this port without any trouble.'"

"NORFOLK AND NEWPORT NEWS, August 2, 1916.

"Foreign and domestic vessels leaving are paying sailors $45, quartermasters $50, boatswains $55, firemen $50, and oilers $55. In vessels that bring crews with lower wages the men ask for one-half pay and receive it or they leave and they usually receive the whole pay. In a few instances the masters of the vessels have given the men the one-half pay asked for, and they, in order to keep them, have raised the wages of the same crew to the port standard. A special instance of this is the Norwegian steamer Hercules."

"SEATTLE, May 1½, 1916.

"From letter dated Seattle, May 8, 1916, and signed by P. B. Gill, agent Seamen's Union, I quote the following extract:

"'Since March 4 there is no record of any British vessels having shipped any men here. Three Peruvian vessels, the Mario, Algoa Bay, and Quadro Hermandoes, shipped crews and paid $30 per month in the two first and $35 per month in the last one mentioned. I am informed that one of them paid $40, but of this I am not sure. These vessels were supplied crews from the boarding masters at Tacoma. During the same time several American vessels were supplied crews from the same people at $30 and $35 per month. I might mention the Sterling, Charles F. Crocker, and Jane L. Stanford. These are sailing vessels. The American steamer Santa Cruss shipped men on the Sound for $35 per month in April. That is the wages paid here for some time past. The Norwegian steamers Belredge and Taurus shipped some men here at $30 per month. That is an increase of $5 and $10 over what they paid to the previous crew. The Santa Cruss, as I understand, picked up her own men and did not have to pay any bonus. Where the boarding masters furnish crews they always charge a bonus. So in cases where the wages are $5 less than in others, when the bonus is figured in, the rate will be about the same.'"

"SEATTLE, August 2, 1916.

"Two cases in court, where half pay was demanded and refused, am informed that some seamen received half pay. Not many demanding half pay, yet, owing to good wages being paid from Europe, except on American vessels that are mostly trading coastwise, wages are about the same on foreign and American vessels. Two Norwegian vessels, $50 to sailors and firemen, and some American vessels have received crews for $35, $40, and $45 per month."

"PORTLAND, May 1½, 1916.

"The following is an extract from a letter dated Portland, Oreg., April 17, and signed by Jack Rosen, agent of the seamen's union:

"'On March 25 the chamber of commerce sent a telegram to Secretary Redfield complaining about foreign ships being held up on account of seamen's law. As soon as I saw the telegram in the paper I wired Secretary Redfield, calling his attention to misstatements, and stated, further, that there are plenty of men around that were willing to ship anywhere, providing the wages and conditions were right. Also that wages offered was less than in the coastwise trade or out of Europe. Secretary Redfield ordered the collector of the port to investigate; he sent one of his men to see, and I went around with him for two days. We talked to nearly all the seamen in port, and in nearly all cases the answer was that if the wages in foreign ships were the same as on the coast most of them would ship anywhere; others would not go to Europe for love or money while the present conditions over there are not settled. He finally arrived at the conclusion that the seamen's law had nothing to do with the foreign ships being held up for want of seamen, but that the low wages offered and the conditions in Europe was the cause of it, and he so reported to his superior, the collector.'

"The collector later had a regular investigation, and, according to clipping from the Oregon Journal, the collector came to the following conclusions:

"'Shortage of sailors and not the seamen's law is responsible for any delays which vessels in north Pacific ports are having. * * * Wages on ships going to the war zone have not been raised. * * * Wages on big Alaska fishing fleet have been raised to meet the demands of the shortage. Every steamer and sailing ship that can get up steam or sail is in service and twice as many men as formerly are employed and paid higher wages. * * * Let the shipowners come through and share a small portion of their enormous profits with the men, who take the risks, and you will find sailors enough, declared Judge Burke.' (Judge Burke is the collector of customs.) He is further quoted as saying: 'Antiadministration papers are asserting that vessels never before had to lose time here as they are doing now. All shipping men tell me that it happens annually at this time of the year and that the present fuss is nothing but an attempt to make capital out of a situation to forward political ends.'"

"PORTLAND, August 2, 1916.

"Foreign seamen in this port have demanded and received one-half pay on vessels according to the Seamen's law. The wages on foreign and American vessels are the same."

"SAN FRANCISCO, July 22, 1916.

"We find that the sailors on United States Government transports are paid $40 per month. Quartermasters and boatswains' mates, $45 per month. Boatswain, $50 per month. Most of the men in the deck department are union men, and would measure up to the requirements of the Seamen's law. In the fireroom and in the steward's department Filipinos are employed almost exclusively. Firemen are paid $45 per month; coal passers, $35 per month. The amount allowed for subsistance while in port is 50 cents per day. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the men in the fireroom and steward's department would come up to the language test of the Seamen's law. It would depend entirely upon the nature of the examination, i. e., the official construction of the language test."

"SAN FRANCISCO, August 2, 1916.

"Men in foreign vessels are demanding half pay, but have so far been paid in full. Captains are trying to pick up crews at $40, but have in most cases been compelled to pay fifty-five. Few men want to go for less."

As a matter of special interest I desire to add that the Norwegian steamer Falkland left Philadelphia some six weeks ago for England with a crew hired in Philadelphia at the port wages and together with the bonus for going into the war zone. The crew had been signed to be paid off in Philadelphia. The master of the vessel hired a Chinese crew in England and brought them as passengers to Philadelphia, where they became the regular working crew as soon as the crew shipped at Philadelphia had been paid off. The men shipped in Philadelphia had ample opportunity during their voyage across the Atlantic to ascertain to what extent these Chinese would be able to understand the language of the officers. Neither of them understood any Norwegian and only two or three of them understood enough English to be able to transmit ordinary ship's orders to other Chinese who had so little knowledge of the language that they could not even understand the commonest and simplest orders.

Affidavit has been filed with the collector under section 13 of the seamen's act, and the crew will be mustered. The result of such muster I am not now able to tell, but shall let you know as soon as I get the information.

Men who are watching shipping, and particularly shipping with reference to the wages of the men, now have no doubt at all that with the language clause enforced as it is contemplated in the act, there is bound to be a general equalization of the wage cost of operating vessels.

The only vessels leaving the American ports mentioned at this time without paying the American wage rate are vessels manned by Lascars and Chinese, and these men could not take those vessels to sea at all if the language clause was properly enforced. As it is, they leave at the same rate of wages that they had on coming in, and unless the language clause can be propertly enforced the tendency will be to have more and more of the Lascars and Chinese instead of less.

Respectfully submitted.

ANDREW FURUSETH,
President International Seamen's Union of America.

JULY 7, 1916.

The SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS,
Port of New York.

SIR: On June 28, 1916, I was ordered by Deputy Surveyor William Tierney to muster the crew of the steamship Esperanza, at Pier 16, Brooklyn, and ascertain whether section 13 of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915, was being violated. Accompanied by Inspector C. E. Cole, I mustered the crew of each department with the following result:

Deck crew—4 officers, 1 carpenter, 1 deck boy, 2 cadets, 11 seamen. All had seamen's certificates and understood orders in the English language but could not carry on a conversation in that language.

Engineer's department, 40 men. We examined 27 of them, the remainder being away from the ship on shore leave. The 27 understood orders in English but could carry on very little conversation in that language. None of the 27 had seamen's certificates.

Steward's department, 17 men. These were all Englishmen, and all had lifeboat certificates.

Respectfully,

P. COHEN,
Inspector of Customs.

EASTERN & GULF SAILORS' ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Port of New York, July 11, 1916.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Customhouse, New York City.

DEAR SIR: On June 28, 1916, an affidavit was filed against the Steamship Esperanza, of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., because of violating the language test section of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915.

The Esperanza's crew was mustered by Inspector P. Cohen, of the surveyor's office. The inspector's report reads in part as follows: "Deck department, all had seamen's certificates and understood orders in the English language but could not carry on a conversation in that language. Engineer's department, 40 men. We examined 27 of them, the remainder being away from the ship on shore leave. The 27 understood orders in English but could carry on very little conversation in that language."

The real fact of the matter is that the crew of the steamship Esperanza is not able to understand orders of the officers, and that the orders of the officers are interpreted to the crew by the boatswain.

Section 13 of the seamen's act says: "That no vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and the smaller inland lakes and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel."

Department Circular 265 reads as follows: "The department construes the words 'able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel' to mean the necessary orders that may be given to members of the crew in each department in the course of the performance of their duties. The department also construes the section as meaning only such orders as may normally be given to members of the crew in each department of the vessel in the course of the usual performance of their regular duties. Among these duties, however, should be included lifeboat work, emergency work for such members of the crew as may be called upon to perform these classes of work."

My understanding of the language test section of the seamen's act is that it was enacted primarily for the better safety of life at sea, and that in case of fire or collision, etc., the crew, 75 per cent in each department of the vessel, should be able to understand any and all orders given by the officers of the vessel.

Kindly inform me whether understanding "any orders given by the officers of the vessel" means all orders given in an emergency, or what is meant by "necessary orders," or orders "as may normally be given to members of the crew in each department." Your construction upon these matters contained in Department Circular 265 will be greatly appreciated by me.

Very respectfully, yours,

G. H. BROWN,
Agent Eastern & Gulf Sailors' Association.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COLLECTOR UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE,
Port of New York, July 12, 1916.

EASTERN AND GULF SAILORS' ASSOCIATION (INC.),
51 South Street, New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: This office is in receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, in regard to the muster of seamen on the steamship Esperanza on June 23, 1916, and notes your opinion that the construction put upon department circular No. 265 is not in accordance with your ideas of what the law was intended to accomplish.

The subject of your letter, namely, the "language test" as included in the seamen's act, will receive careful consideration by this office, and your letter will be transmitted to the Secretary of Commerce with a statement or suggestions as to the views of this office in the matter. On receipt of the department's reply you will be further advised.

Respectfully,

H. C. STEWART,
Special Deputy Collector.

The letter has reference to the Norwegian steamer Falkland.

The Falkland brought a Norwegian crew to Philadelphia some weeks since. The crew left and the master hired a crew in Philadelphia, paying the wages of the port for a voyage to England and return. In England he hired a Chinese crew and carried them as passengers to Philadelphia, where he discharged the crew hired in that port.

That the Chinese could speak neither Norwegian or English was ascertained by the old crew on the voyage across the Atlantic.

A muster was demanded under section 13 of the seamen's law. This muster and the result is described in the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, August 8, 1916.

MR. ANDREW FURUSETH.

DEAR COMRADE: Your letter of August 7 received. I, together with Comrade Carlson, was present at the mustering of the Chinese crew of the steamship Falkland on August 3. The examining officer mustered the crew according to his instructions or understanding of section 13 of the seamen's act. No emergency orders were used, only such questions as are commonly used every day in a ship were directed to the crew by the examining officer through the captain and officers of the ship. I suggested to the examining officer to question the crew and find out if they were able to understand emergency orders. He stated that he was not authorized to do same and was compelled to act according to his instructions as he had received them. When we came on board the ship the examining officer lined the deck crew up, who consisted of nine Chinese men. Six of those seemed to understand orders used under ordinary circumstances. Evidently they had sailed in British ships for some years. One or two questions were asked each man. Six of them understood the questions, three failed to understand them. Each man was called to one side and asked separately. The examining officer then gave no permission to ask them such questions as were commonly used and the six out of the nine were able to understand me. If I had been permitted to use emergency orders or questions the entire crew would have failed. The deck officer also tried to use signs, which seemed difficult for them to understand. That they were not permitted to do same.

The fireroom crew consisted of 14 Chinese men. They were all called in the engine room and questioned by the examining officer through the engineer. Five out of the 14 could not understand any of the questions. The other 9 understood but very little; and if emergency orders were used, none of those men were able to understand them. I also found that a No. 1 man was used in each department. I asked the mate why he used a No. 1 man. He told me that he gave his orders to him, as he was the boatswain. I also asked the engineers why they had used a No. 1 man. They told me the same was necessary, as the other men could not understand the orders. The No. 1 man in the fireroom crew was one of the 5 who could not understand the orders and was disqualified by the examining officer.

After the muster the examining officer told me that he would give me a written report of same, but I have up to this time not received any. But the result was that the ship was credited with having 77 per cent of the deck crew who were able to understand the orders of the officer and only 65 per cent of the engine-room crew who were able to understand the orders of the officers. The master was therefore not permitted to clear his vessel; and the acting collector told me yesterday that it may be necessary to muster the crew again before clearing can be granted.

Will give you further information on this matter soon as obtainable. Will send affidavits if necessary.

Yours, fraternally,

WALTER NIELSON.

[Department Circular No. 265, Bureau of Navigation.]

LANGUAGE TEST UNDER THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, September 18, 1915.

To collectors of customs and others concerned:

Section 13 of the seamen's act of March 4, 1915, in part, provides as follows:

"No vessel of 100 tons gross and upward, except those navigating rivers exclusively and the smaller inland lakes, and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel. * * *

"The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any reputable citizen of the United States setting forth that this section is not being complied with, cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine the fact; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section * * *."

This section will take effect as to vessels of the United States on November 4, 1915, and as to all foreign vessels on March 4, 1916.

The department construes the words "able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel" to mean the necessary orders that may be given to members of the crew in each department in the course of the performance of their duties.

The department does not construe the above section as requiring the use of any particular language on the part of officers and crew of any vessel. Any language which is understood in sufficient measure by both the officers and the proper proportion of the crew will comply with the law. It must clearly be understood, therefore, that the section can not be construed as requiring an English-speaking crew. For example, on a French vessel the French language, if spoken by the officers and if understood by the proper proportion of the crew, would suffice. The same would be true of Spanish on a Spanish vessel, of German on a German vessel. Therefore no specific language is required, but only that, whatever language is used, it shall be understood as the law requires.

The department also construes the section as meaning only such orders as may normally be given to members of the crew in each department of the vessel in the course of the usual performance of their regular duties. Among these duties, however, should be included lifeboat work or emergency work for such members of the crew as may be called upon to perform these classes of work. The department would not consider it a proper construction of the section to require, for example, that a waiter should understand orders normal to the engine-room force or that a stoker should be required to understand orders which related solely to the work of a deckhand or seaman. In the cases, however, of a waiter, a stoker, a seaman, or other employee on the vessel who was assigned to do emergency or lifeboat work it would be a proper construction of the section to require him to understand orders for such emergency or lifeboat service.

The department construes the section to mean that a demonstration in the presence of the customs collector or his deputy by the proper proportion of the crew in executing the actual orders of an officer would be a sufficient proof of compliance with the law. It will be noted that the orders are to be given "by the officers" and not by the customs collector or anyone acting in his behalf.

The department further construes the section to mean that the muster of the crew for which the law provides shall take place at such reasonable times and occasions as will determine the facts sufficiently in advance of the time fixed for the sailing of the vessel to permit the engaging of such new members of the crew as may be necessary in time for the vessel to sail without delay. The department understands the law to require the safeguarding of the vessel through the language test by such means, at such times, and in such a manner as shall be helpful and not hurtful to our maritime commerce, and that it is in no sense intended to be used to create embarrassment or to cause unnecessary expense or delay.

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida—I did not catch all of his remarks—what is he putting these facts in as evidence of? What is it that he wants to show by them?

Mr. FLETCHER. To show the actual wages being paid seamen at the principal ports of the country on our vessels, vessels flying the American flag, and on vessels flying foreign flags.

Mr. LIPPITT. What is the deduction from that? Of course, everyone knows that the wages of seamen are enormously high at the present moment. Is it to prove that the wages are high?

Mr. FLETCHER. I had in mind that the difference is being gradually diminished, so that practically they are on the same basis.

Mr. LIPPITT. Of course, everybody knows that the effect of the war on the wages of seamen has been to nearly double them.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. STONE. I move the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 16, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. PADGETT. Of course, that is not to interfere with conference reports?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; that condition attaches always.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] object to my being sandwiched in between Dr. TEMPLE and Mr. HILL for one hour?

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, on July 13 I made a speech in the House, in which I referred to the Water Power Development Association as being engaged in a propaganda in behalf of the Shields bill and the Myers bill, in which they were sending out certain written matter and having it published by the newspapers of the country, subsequently collecting some of these editorials and articles and mailing them to Congressmen as reprints, as though they had originated at the place where they were published. My attention has been called to a letter from the Water Power Development Association addressed to Members of Congress and given out to the press, in which they say that my statements were absolutely untrue and without any foundation. It is to this subject that I wish to address myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the letter that was mailed to the Members of the House is as follows:

WATER POWER DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION,
MUNSEY BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1916.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: There are inclosed for your information copies of letters sent to Representative GEORGE R. SMITH, of Minnesota, on July 24, 1916, in reply to certain untrue and baseless charges made by him on the floor of the House concerning the work of this association.

Yours, very truly,

HERMAN B. WALKER.

Now, my colleagues, I regret at this time to inject a reply to this letter into this morning's proceedings, because I realize that you are all anxious to take up general legislation, and especially the naval appropriation bill. No one is more interested in the Navy than I am. I wish we had an incomparable Navy, not for the sake alone of protecting our material wealth, but for the sake of protecting our Government, which was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are equal and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is for the purpose of protecting that Government which the great Chief Justice Marshall vivified and electrified by the great knowledge and patriotism which he breathed into it; but, my colleagues, what would our Government amount to or how long would it last if the moral fiber of the people were destroyed? The Romans withstood the world until they became corrupt. It was not the northern tribes that overcame the Romans. It was their own degradation, their own immorality, their own lack of love for truth and veracity.

Our country, with all its boasted freedom, with all its great wealth, with all its love of liberty, would not long endure if corruption, dishonesty, deception, and untruth became the dominant spirit in our body politic. Therefore it occurs to me that it is of much more importance that we try to protect the Government from its enemies within than to build large navies to defend ourselves against a foreign foe.

Before I came to Congress I was much interested in the development and conservation of our natural resources, and on coming here I immediately took up the study of our water powers and their development. I found this subject to be an exceptionally complicated one and in need of legislation. A certain group of water-power promoters have seriously objected to my activities along these lines because my idea of what should be done did not coincide with their legislative program. However, I regret that in their opposition to my efforts to secure wise and beneficial water-power legislation they have seen fit to carry on a campaign of slander and vilification instead of coming out in the open and discussing the matter on its merits. Their stock argument is abuse. I will not enter into personalities with them. I have no time; I have not the disposition. I love my fellow man too well. I have been told by some of my associates not to stir up the matter, because the more you stir corruption the worse it smells. Gentlemen, I live in a community that had skunks, and we never refrained from killing a skunk because it smelt.

I feel it my duty to turn the light on the corrupt practices of this association, that the public may kill it, not because I have any personal grudge against it, nor because I feel that it is going to advance my interests. However, from a sense of duty, right, and justice I make these disclosures.

In the speech that I made on July 13 I said something about a certain number of men that have been in Washington promoting water-power legislation, and I incorporated in my remarks a list of the names of those men, but for some unaccountable reason when my speech appeared in the RECORD that list of names was not there. The Official Reporters of debates had nothing to do with my speech, as it was typewritten.

The following is the list of names that was omitted: Josiah T. Newcomb, of Stone & Webster; L. L. Nunn, of the Utah Power Co.; H. G. Pierce, of Seattle, Wash.; J. H. Finney, of the Aluminum Co. of America; Ex-Congressman D. T. Flynn, of Oklahoma; Calvert Townly, of the Westinghouse interests; Hugh L. Cooper, Dupont interests; Frank M. Washburn, American Cyanamide Co.; ex-Congressman C. D. Landis, Dupont interests; Rome G. Brown, chief lecturer, draftsman, and attorney for some of the water-power companies; and S. Z. Mitchell, General Electric Co.

If the mysterious forces of electrical energy are placed within easy reach of all the people through the agency of the Government, their burdens will be measurably lightened and their comforts greatly increased. On the other hand, if the Government fails and neglects to control this well-nigh universal future source of industrial power, and permits it, unregulated and uncontrolled, to remain in selfish and unsympathetic private hands, it is certain to become the controlling force of the most despotic combination ever created to control the commercial, industrial, and domestic affairs of the people. Even the very Government itself, if not already under the influence of this combination, will sooner or later be corrupted by the evil influences bound to emanate from so vast and unrestrained twentieth-century organization of natural and artificial forces.

Mr. Speaker, I said other things on this occasion that stirred to their innermost circles that most worthy and patriotic band of make-believe conservationists—the water-power monopolists. Through their chief agency, the Water Power Development Association, of this city, this noble band of unselfish promoters and captains of high finance have attempted to wage against me a scurrilous and ruthless war because, sir, I had the temerity to expose, as was my bounden duty—being a servant of the people—their pernicious activity in the framing of, and the molding of public opinion to force its passage through Congress, legislation that would enable them to get and hold forever the remains of the last great natural resource of the people—water power—to the extent of 60,000,000 horsepower, worth billions of dollars.

In a written communication, distributed among the Members of Congress and the press, this coterie of eminent gentlemen, by their mouthpiece, the man of Everglades fame, takes exception to my remarks of the 13th, appearing on page 10972 of the RECORD, and more particularly to that portion which refers to the underhanded and deceptive methods and practices resorted to by the Water Power Development Association for the purpose of manufacturing public sentiment in favor of the Shields bill.

The following is the part of my speech that they take special exception to:

> One of the methods adopted by this association to deceive the public was to send free plate matter to country publishers and have them run in the daily papers as an expression of their own opinion, subsequently collecting these editorials and mailing them regularly to Members of Congress without any explanation, thus conveying the impression that the article presented the local opinion of the community in which the matter circulated.

The association says that the above charges, as well as the editorial that I incorporated in my remarks from the Mineral Point (Wis.) Democrat, which alleged that the publicity methods of the water-power association are "rotten," are not in accord with the facts, and are wholly unjustified by the facts. By way of confession and avoidance, the association states that:

> First. We have never sent plate matter to any publisher who has not requested it.
> Second. We have never sent out editorial matters to any newspaper in the form of plates.
> Third. We have never written an editorial for any newspaper, except upon request of the editor or publisher.
> Fourth. We have never sent any Members of Congress clippings of newspaper articles printed from plate matter furnished by us.

This general denial appears to be a complete refutation of the charges of deception made against this highly patriotic and unselfish association that is moved by no other motive than that of rendering gratuitously disinterested, exceptionally costly, expert service to the public. It makes a complete denial of every charge made against it, and in the next breath admits that this denial is untrue. Notwithstanding the bristling denial found on page 1 of the association's anomalous communication, given wide circulation, we discover the following admission on page 2 of this incomparable document:

> We have sent out articles in manuscript to the leading newspapers and periodicals of the country during the past six months which have been extensively published. We discovered, however, that the smaller country papers could not afford to set the type for articles on general subjects, and would not do so, and when the American Press Association made us a proposition to send general articles on water-power to the country newspapers in the form of plate matter, we accepted their proposal and made a contract with them to furnish such service.

Now that the association has made a clean breast of matters by its confession and avoidance, it demands of its exposers that they absolve it from wrong-doing or be forever held up to scorn and ridicule for telling the truth, and nothing but the truth, about a set of the most avaricious financial pirates since the days of Capt. Kidd. What a philosophical mind these promoters of special legislation have! How little they credit the rest of mankind with knowing! There will be a rude awakening as soon as the public are onto their game.

What are the facts about the purposes and activities of this association? Are we going to let it proclaim them? Or are we to judge it by what it has done? If the latter, what are some of the things it has done? First of all, it has sent out to the leading newspapers and periodicals of the country editorials and articles, prepared by itself, boosting the Shields and Myers bills, some of which have been published, and these publications have been marked "reprinted" by the Water Power Development Association and mailed to Congressmen without any explanation, thus leading Members of Congress to believe that these editorials and articles originated in and represented the sentiment of the community in which the paper circulated. The association discovered, however, that the smaller country papers could not afford to set the type for these articles, and would not do so, and therefore other arrangements had to be made to take care of the country newspaper. In order to meet this situation the association hired, for a handsome price, the American Press Association, to get country newspapers to publish articles on water power and water-power legislation, furnished by the Water Power Development Association.

The following is a letter received on or about May 26 by Robert M. Crawford, one of the editors and proprietors of the Democrat, Mineral Point, Wis.:

MAY 25, 1916.

To the publisher:

Inclosed you will find proof of a page of matter prepared by the Water Power Development Association containing interesting articles on the development of water power for the reclamation of undeveloped land and industries in the country. The United States figures show that there is now undeveloped in this country about 35,000,000 horsepower of water power. To develop and use even one-half of this means conserving the labor of 300,000 men now employed in coal mining. One article is by Hugh L. Cooper, the builder of the Keokuk Dam; another by Pinchot, and one by HENRY L. MYERS, United States Senator from Montana. We are authorized to ship the plates of this page to you free of charge and transportation prepaid if you wish to use it. If you wish to use these interesting and valuable articles, sign and return the inclosed card.

Yours, very truly, AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION.

It will be noted that the Press Association in its letter lays special stress on the fact that these articles were written by men of national reputation, such as Hugh L. Cooper, one of the active participants in the Water Power Association's affairs; Mr. Pinchot and Senator MYERS, author of the Myers water-power public-land bill; that the articles were very "interesting and valuable" and would be furnished free of charge even to the extent of expressage. Apparently a very generous offer, an exceptionally clever letter, calculated to throw the most cautious editor off his guard. All he had to do to get these highly interesting boiler-plate articles was to sign the inclosed stamped card and drop it in the mail box. Quite a temptation to an enterprising newspaper man. A number fell for this proposition, so I am told.

The sample page of matter referred to in the association's letter to Mr. Crawford, instead of carrying, as expressly stated, an article by Mr. Pinchot, the one man above all others known to be the avowed champion of the people's interests against the water-power crowd, carried an article of the Water Power Development Association, in which Mr. Pinchot was bitterly assailed for daring to criticize the Shields bill and extolling the virtues of this hypocritical piece of legislation.

And this is not all. Hugh L. Cooper, in an article appearing on this sample page, said:

To get any development and use of water power we first must have Federal legislation that will open the water powers to use. The United States Senate the other day passed the Shields bill by a vote of 46 to 22. This measure gives water-power companies the right, under careful restrictions, to dam navigable streams and build power plants therein. A bill providing for leasing of power sites in the public domain has passed the House and is now being debated in the Senate. Certain men and interests are trying to defeat the purposes of this constructive and beneficial legislation by loading it up with unworkable terms and conditions. They are making charges and statements generally vague and containing more innuendo than argument, intended to creat suspicion and mistrust and prevent legislation. It behooves the American manufacturer, the American farmer, and American citizen who has any direct, indirect, or patriotic interest in this subject to study this legislation for himself and arrive at his own conclusion.

A SUGGESTION TO CITIZENS.

Instead of taking the opinion of some one else, I urge every interested citizen to write his Congressman in Washington for copies of the Shields bill and the Myers bill and read them carefully, thoroughly, impartially, and critically. After reading these measures and making up his mind as to their merits I urge him to write his Representative in Congress exactly what he thinks of them, demanding their passage if he thinks them good bills and their defeat if he thinks them bad bills.

Mr. Cooper and his associates in the Water Power Development Association vociferously proclaim that their propaganda is not in favor of any particular bill. If that were the fact, we would be disposed to take their word for certain technical facts of this question which such men as Mr. Cooper thoroughly understand; but instead of these self-constituted instructors being disinterested parties, they have all to gain and nothing to lose by getting a brand of legislation that is of their own making, except the expense of carrying on this campaign, which I am credibly informed is a very large amount, running into thousands of dollars, $22,000 of which I have been able to trace. They have put their brand on the Shields bill and the Myers bill. What better proof of this fact do we want than their own statements? Mr. Cooper says that to get any development and use of water power we first must have Federal legislation that will open the water powers to use, "but that certain men and interests are trying to defeat the purposes of this constructive and beneficial legislation (meaning the Shields and Myers bills) by loading it up with unworkable terms and conditions." After Mr. Cooper puts his own stamp of approval on the Shields and Myers bills in this very unique and forcible manner by designating "them as constructive and beneficial legislation," he advises and urges the interested citizen to write his Congressman, not for his opinion which would, as Mr. Cooper and his associates put it, "tend to create suspicion and mistrust" "and prevent legislation," but for a copy of the "Shields bill and the Myers bill" that he may, in the light of the information received from the Water Power Development Association, make up his mind as to their merits; and after he has done this he is urged by these disinterested parties to "write his Congressman demanding their passage." Mind you, Mr. Interested Citizen, the party who is now cautioning you against the ignorance and disloyalty of your own Congressman is the same Mr. Cooper who on March 11, 1914, before a committee of the House of Representatives made the statement that he was afraid of a State and that he would not trust some States with a five-dollar bill. Even an Industrial Worker of the World would not make such anarchistic charges for the sole purpose of furthering his own personal interests and those of his associates.

Why did not Mr. Cooper in his "suggestion to citizens" to send for the Shields and Myers bills, if he desired an intelligent opinion, include in his suggestion the Adamson bill passed by the House in 1914 by practically a unanimous vote; or the Ferris bill; or the public-land bill passed at the same session; or the confidential Senate committee print, with Rome Brown's criticism; or the Smith bill of 1916? Moreover, if the Water Power Development Association had no ulterior motive in carrying on its propaganda, why did it run, on the same page sent to Mr. Crawford and in a column parallel to Cooper's "suggestion to citizens to send for the Shields and Myers bills," this statement, written by its own officer?—

This association holds no brief for any particular bill, and is anxious only for legislation that will stimulate new industries and national prosperity through development and use of water power now flowing to waste. We believe the Shields bill to be such a measure. We believe that it offers terms to capital which will encourage investment in water-power development. We believe that the indorsement of this bill by former Secretary Garrison and by the Senate committee and the fact that among the Senators who voted for its passage after four weeks of exclusive debate were representatives of the Democratic, Republican, and Progressive Parties, while only 22 votes could be mustered against it, is evidence that the bill gives full consideration and protection to all public rights and interests.

Has not the Water Power Development Association by its conduct and the statements of its officers and associates conclusively shown that it was created for the sole purpose of forcing Congress to pass the Shields bill and the Myers bill, its own pet measures?

It has told the citizens in plain terms through its various methods of publicity—and this boiler-plate method is only one of many devices resorted to by it to humbug the public—that these bills "give full consideration and protection to all the public rights and interests" and that each citizen should "demand" his Congressman to pass them forthwith. What a strange attitude for a self-constituted, nonpolitical, nonpartisan, and disinterested association! The article that I have quoted from this boiler-plate page charges, indirectly, of course, that Senators WALSH, KENYON, LA FOLLETTE, HUSTING, CUMMINS, NORRIS, and Representatives MANN, SHERLEY, LENROOT, FERRIS, COOPER of Wisconsin, ANDERSON, NORTON, and SIMS, Members of Congress who have led the fight against these obnoxious measures, "are making charges and statements generally vague and containing more innuendo than argument, intended to create suspicion and mistrust and prevent wise and wholesome legislation" embodied in the Shields and Myers bills. The whole vice of this charge lies in the fact that this association pretends to be a disinterested party to this controversy and is making these charges for the good of the public, when, as a matter of fact, they are discrediting the very men who are leading the fight in behalf of the public against the water-power monopoly in order to get their pet measures through Congress. This is consistent with the campaign carried on by this water-power crowd, for as soon as a representative of the people attempts to interfere with their plans of getting through Congress their pet measures they instantly proclaim that he is ignorant, vicious, and unpatriotic.

This language appears in their letter:

There has been no effort of any kind on our part to deceive anybody, either as to our identity and motives or as to the facts and economies of water-power legislation.

A most worthy purpose, splendidly proclaimed, but, alas, how far it appears from the truth when the white light of publicity is turned onto its practices. For illustration, in the latter part of March I received through the mails a reprint of an editorial appearing in the Ottumwa Courier of March 14 from the Water Power Development Association, without any explanation accompanying it. Having received several other editorials of the same character from this company in the same manner, all written in the interests of the Shields and Myers bills, my suspicions became aroused and I made an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining where these editorials originated, and, to my great surprise, discovered that the editorial appearing in the Courier was prepared and forwarded to the Courier by the Water Power Development Association itself, with the specific instruction that it was not to be released until the Senate had passed the Shields bill. The Courier did not print quite all of the editorial which the association sent, but the part it did print is in the exact language of the editorial sent to it by the association, a carbon copy of which I hold in my hand. At this point I will insert, with the consent of the House, in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the Courier's editorial. If any Member desires to examine the carbon copy of the original editorial prepared and sent by the Water Power Development Association to the Courier, I will let him have it for that purpose.

SHIELDS WATER-POWER BILL.

The Shields water-power bill authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits for the building of dams and power plants on navigable streams, is about ready for a vote in the United States Senate. This will be the first vote taken in the Senate on a general water-power measure in the eight years that the subject of conservation of natural resources has been under consideration in Congress. Two water-power bills passed the House last year and died in the Senate.

Senate leaders and military authorities urge the Shields bill as a vital feature of the preparedness program. It is estimated that there is 60,000,000 horsepower of natural energy in the navigable streams of the United States, of which nine-tenths is flowing to waste. These great water powers have been locked out of use up to now, as a special act of Congress has been necessary for each power plant and it has been impossible to pass workable tracts for the development of large water powers.

Senator SHIELDS, of Tennessee, announced in the Senate that the passage of this bill would be followed by early development of water powers aggregating 15,000,000 horsepower or a volume of electricity equal to that produced by a coal consumption of 100,000,000 tons a year. Engineers estimate that development of this amount of water power equals a saving of $700,000 a day in coal bills.

It is known that a number of big electrochemical plants for making saltpeter and nitric acid from the air have been planned by private enterprise, and will be built as soon as the Shields bill becomes a law and makes it possible to finance these undertakings. These chemicals are essential to the manufacture of explosives and agricultural fertilizers, and at present the United States is wholly dependent for its supply upon the nitrate deposits of Chile. The Chilean Government collects a high tax upon every ton of nitrate exported. There is at present not a single atmospheric nitrogen plant in this country, although Europe has 1,200,000 horsepower of hydroelectricity devoted to this use, and Germany is making 600,000 tons of saltpeter a year in such establishments for military and agricultural uses.

Electrification of railroads, manufacture of iron and steel in electric furnaces, and extensive irrigation developments in the West are among other benefits expected to be derived from the utilization of large water powers for generation of cheap electricity.

Under the terms of the Shields bill the Secretary of War is authorized to grant permits for dams and power plants where he believes the building of such dams will improve navigability of streams. Dams are to be built without cost to the Government, and the grantees are to provide and operate locks, gates, sluiceways, etc., all without cost to the Government. Permits may be granted to individuals, political subdivisions of States, cities or other municipal corporations, or to public-utility corporations. Intrastate business and rates of companies operating under the act are to be regulated by the States, and interstate service and rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Municipally owned dams and power plants for irrigation or for supplying power for municipal purposes are to be given preference in making leases for surplus water powers in the streams. The bill does not apply to water power on small streams and crecks, used for gristmills, sawmills, etc.

The measure contains a drastic antimonopoly clause providing that no dam or works constructed under its provisions shall be owned, leased, controlled, or operated "by any device or in any manner so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination in the form of unlawful monopoly, or form the subject of any unlawful constraint or conspiracy to limit the output of electrical energy or in restraint of trade."

In the light of this information what credit are we to give the declaration of the association that it has never made any effort of any kind to deceive anybody? If you can conceive of any more clever way to deceive the public than that adopted by this association in its publicity campaign, as evidenced by the matters that I have called to your attention, I would like to have some one indicate how it can be done. In the face of these facts—and I assure you that they are only a few of the many that can be obtained—I am not surprised at all at the method adopted by the association to make it appear that my statements as to their methods of doing business were untrue and wholly unjustified by any of the facts connected with its publicity campaign. All of this goes to show what an elastic conscience these dissemblers have and what dupes it must think the public are. Their only redeeming feature is their unlimited supply of unadulterated gall.

I will not detain the House to read the letter which I received from the editor of the Democrat (Mineral Point, Wis.), but will content myself with inserting it in the RECORD at this point:

OFFICE OF THE IOWA COUNTY DEMOCRAT,
Mineral Point, Wis., July 29, 1916.

Hon. GEORGE R. SMITH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: I received and read your letter of July 26, together with the letters of Mr. Cortland Smith and Mr. Herman B. Walker. In reply I am sending you proofs received from the American Press Association, together with the letters transmitting them. I brought the matter up at a meeting of the Wisconsin Press Association, not to take a fall out of Mr. Smith, but rather to turn the light onto the methods used by the water-power promoters to create a spontaneous sentiment in favor of their measures before the House and the Senate at Washington. Chiefly, I wanted to present the matter so that the Wisconsin newspaper men present would not use water-power plate matter; and this, I think, has been done, because none of the exchanges coming to this office use the matter. As I understand it, Mr. Smith started out to defend the sending out of these proofs and matter; but rather broke down in his defense, confessed that it was "rotten business," and went on to condemn in even more severe terms other forms of plate matter sent out by other houses. If their matter is printed in a newspaper, and the water-power companies pay for it, even to the extent of preparing the matter and furnishing the plate, that fact ought to be disclosed to the public. Whether by inadvertence or otherwise, the letter from the American Press Association is misleading. It says that the page of proof contains an article by Pinchot, whereas it contains no such article, but rather a long article assailing Mr. Pinchot. I do not think there was any report taken down of my questions to Mr. Cortland Smith and his answers; but Merlin Hull, of Black River Falls, former speaker of the Wisconsin Assembly, and Richard Lloyd Jones, editor of the Wisconsin State Journal (Madison), and many others were present, and I think they will all bear out my statement of the case.

I thank you for standing up for the public welfare in the matter of water-power control, and hope that I have not misled you by a short article which I know is the truth.

Very truly, yours, ROBERT M. CRAWFORD.

In support of the statements made by Mr. Crawford I wish to inform the House that I have a telegram from Richard Lloyd Jones, editor of the Wisconsin State Journal (Madison), in which he confirms all that Mr. Crawford said about boiler-plate matter in his letter to me.

Not being a newspaper man, I may not have called things by their right names. However, I am confident that I have placed before this House and the country conclusive proof of the rotten, deceptive, and corrupt methods used by this association to manufacture sentiment in support of the Shields and Myers bills, and if I have been able to do this, I am content. I have no personal quarrel with any man or set of men. Neither can I be induced to neglect my official duties to engage in a quarrel. Legislation which has not sufficient merit to stand upon its own bottom should be scrapped. It is only when an attempt is made to pass vicious legislation that its sponsors resort to the tactics of this association, and then it is only men possessing the instincts of Mr. Herman B. Walker who have the audacity and cunning to indulge in such practices. The Water Power Development Association was organized by a few representatives of the Water Power Trust with headquarters in New York City, and undoubtedly for the sake of giving it a standing these promoters, knowing full well that the public was onto them, induced a number of highly respectable and fair-minded men and business houses to become nonparticipating members; and in criticizing this association's methods I regret that there is not some way of separating the sheep from the goats. The association started its career by hiring as its publicity agent the principal publicity man from the office of Secretary Lane, of the Interior Department, a former newspaper correspondent by the name of Herman B. Walker, and Marcus A. Beeman as its secretary.

Mr. Beeman has been assistant secretary for the Cleveland and Buffalo Chambers of Commerce and secretary of the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce. Thus it will be seen that the association surrounded itself with two men of wide experience in two different lines of publicity—one through the commercial clubs and the other through the newspapers. Mr. Beeman has evidently been successful in getting a number of the commercial clubs throughout the country to indorse the Shields and Myers bills by resolutions cleverly drawn and subsequently forwarded to the Members of Congress. As an evidence of this statement I call attention to a few of these resolutions appearing on pages 10968, 10969, 10970 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. Notwithstanding the fact that these resolutions were adopted by clubs situated in States widely separated from each other, they are practically all duplicates. Mr. Walker's association with the water-power crowd dates back to some time prior to the launching of the association. While he was still employed in Secretary Lane's office it came to my knowledge that he spent considerable time in New York City and had a desk in the office of one of the water-power promoters, who is now his right-hand man in conducting the affairs of the Water Power Development Association. He claimed to be studying the water-power situation from New York City, and from what developed later, when certain advance confidential information that the Secretary of Agriculture furnished the Secretary of the Interior in reference to a report which the Secretary of Agriculture was preparing on water power and hydroelectric combinations and trusts, in response to the Borah resolution, reached the heads of the hydroelectric monopoly in New York City, and they immediately came to the Secretary of Agriculture and tried to persuade him to either change his report or give them a hearing, there has never been any doubt as to Mr. Walker's mission in New York City or as to who furnished this advance information to the water-power promoters. Neither has there been much doubt as to where the money comes from that pays the expense of running the Water Power Development Association and its expensive corps of legislative and hydroelectric experts.

Just imagine, if you will, the power and the influence and the activity of the commercial clubs of this country. Just imagine what pressure you can bring to bear upon Congress if you can get the commercial clubs of the country interested in a proposition. The time has come when the public should serve notice on the commercial clubs that we welcome their activity, we welcome their interest in legislation, we welcome their suggestions, but we do not want them to get behind a propaganda without knowing what they are doing. I am sure if they understood the evil effect of the legislation embodied in the Shields bill, they would withhold their indorsement. We are always glad to see organization, when organization means the development of something useful and helpful to mankind, and not for the advancement of its own personal gain.

Now, gentlemen, let me call your attention for a minute to this evidence found in the RECORD, on pages 12677, 12678, and 12679, put in the RECORD for what purpose? For the purpose of influencing Congress. This looks very much like Mr. Beeman's work, as secretary of the Water Power Development Association. You will recall that he was secretary of several commercial clubs before he took this position. The following are some of the resolutions found on these pages.

A resolution passed by the Raleigh Chamber of Commerce, Raleigh, N. C.:

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws—

And so forth, concluding by indorsing the Shields bill.

A resolution adopted by the Commercial Club of Salt Lake City, Utah:

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws—

And so forth, indorsing the Shields bill.

Resolutions passed by the Carbondale Business Men's Association, Carbondale, Pa.:

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws—

Concluding by indorsing the Shields bill.

Resolutions passed by the El Paso Chamber of Commerce, El Paso, Tex.:

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws—

And so forth.

Resolutions passed by the Rome Chamber of Commerce, Rome, Ga.:

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws—

Concluding by indorsing the Shields bill.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do these men know what they are indorsing? These resolutions are practically all duplicates, word for word, presented to the commercial clubs by the same party or parties. For the information of the House I will at this point insert one of these resolutions:

BY THE CARBONDALE BUSINESS MEN'S ASSOCIATION, CARBONDALE, PA.

Whereas 60,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the rivers and streams of the United States now go to waste because their development is financially impossible under our present laws; and

Whereas cheap electrical power, for the irrigation of our desert lands; for the treatment of our limestone, phosphate, and mineral resources; for the operation of light, heat, and power plants in areas now closed to electrical competition; for the electrification of divisions of our railroads; for the manufacture of nitrogen from the air on a scale to lessen the costs of our farm fertilizers and to insure us an adequate ammunition supply in time of war; and for reducing the cost of power in manufacturing of every description, now waits upon a change in our present laws; and

Whereas water-power development, under vigilant regulation by national and State authorities, insuring absolute freedom from monopoly or restraint of trade and forfeiture in event of failure to develop and termination of the Government franchise at the end of 50 years, and the payment of compensation to the Government for any use of Government property and land, is fully secured in the Shields bill, recently passed by the Senate of the United States and now pending in the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Carbondale Business Men's Association, of Carbondale, Pa., an association representing the commercial, agricultural, and mining interest of the community, upon which depends the livelihood, prosperity, and comfort of a population of 35,000 now comprised within the commercial, agricultural, and mining district in and around the city of Carbondale, Pa., hereby indorses the Shields bill as passed by the Senate, free from impractical provisions that so disastrously have prevented water-power development in recent years, and hereby respectfully urges upon the House of Representatives the immediate passage of this bill; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed by the secretary of this association to the Congressman representing this district and to the Senators from the State of Pennsylvania.

Every fact that I have thus far stated has been authenticated by the written words of the Water Power Development Association and its adherents, which have been correctly quoted by me in the foregoing statement. This mass of written evidence clearly shows that this monopoly has not only tried to deceive and humbug the public, but to blackmail Members of Congress into passing the Shields bill, a measure that would turn over, without compensation, 60,000,000 of undeveloped horsepower, worth billions of dollars, to these monopolists in perpetuity, free from effective regulation and control.

Since neither of the two great political parties have clearly expressed itself on the water-power question in its platform, it is incumbent upon the candidates for the presidency, as well as those for the Senate and Members of the House, to indicate their position on this very important question.

President Wilson has in a very uncertain and vague way expressed his position in a letter to Representative KENT of California, wherein he states:

It is better to let the water power run to waste than to settle the use of it in the wrong way.

This statement will hardly satisfy the voters, who are anxious to know just how the President stands on this question.

There is no doubt as to how Mr. Hughes stands on this question as he stated on several occasions while governor of New York just where he stood. In his message to the legislature in 1907 he stated, among other things:

It is well to consider the great value of the undeveloped water powers thus placed under State control. They should be preserved and held for the benefit of all the people and should not be surrendered to private interests. A proper policy with reference to the development and control of water powers should be established in order that these important sources of our prosperity may be held to the utmost extent possible for the benefit of all the people. No grant should be made of water-power privileges without compensation and under restrictions which will properly protect the rights of the public from whom the privileges are derived.

In his message of 1909 he declared:

The only way to deal with this, it seems to me—and it is time that it be dealt with—is to have the State control its undeveloped water powers, develop them according to the most improved method that science can suggest, preserve them for the benefit of all the people of the State in perpetuity, and let no individual or selfish hand control the sources of industrial power; and then provide fair means by which the developed powers can be availed of in individual enterprise. * * * We have a growing State; we hardly stop to think of what it will be in 50 years from now; and however this or that matter may engage the attention of the moment, we will be judged by our children according to the way we act in the light of the necessities which they will know and feel. The subjects that you are dealing with in this conference are those that are not important simply for this generation and will, perhaps, add very little to the immediate advantage of those here present; but you are trying to conserve the interests of the people by wise planning and by that careful and statesmanlike foresight which will enable posterity with justice to rise and call you blessed.

While I have not examined the details of the water-power bill which Mr. Hughes vetoed while he was governor, I am informed that its basic principles were on all fours with the Shields and Myers bills.

A pamphlet issued by the New York Young Republican Club that reached my desk this morning has this to say of the Shields bill and the Myers bill:

AUGUST 12, 1916.

To the President, Senators and Members of Congress of the United States:

This committee respectfully calls your attention to four indefensible measures affecting the natural resources of the United States now pending in Congress, and asks your best efforts toward their defeat. We refer to the Shields water-power bill, S. 3331; the Myers water-power bill, Senate amendments to House bill 408; the Phelan oil-lands bill, Senate amendments to House bill 406; and the summer homestead bill, S. 1065.

These four bills are in varying degrees efforts to give away the national patrimony to private individuals and corporations while the attention of the Nation is largely preoccupied in its foreign relations.

We would welcome "conservation" measures drafted on proper lines; but the bills referred to are merely "grabs" of a flagrant character. They are not to be excused by a professed interest in conservation, for genuine conservation measures are stifled in Congress.

We trust that you will lend your aid to prevent the above bills being slipped through in the closing days of the session, and to prevent any similar bills from becoming law.

Respectfully, yours,

COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL AFFAIRS OF THE NEW YORK YOUNG REPUBLICAN CLUB,
By BENJAMIN M. DAY, Chairman,

Committee on national affairs: Benjamin M. Day (chairman), Albert S. Bard, Herbert L. Bodman, O. H. Cheney, Charles H. Deller, Bruce M. Falconer, W. W. Hoppin, Charles E. Hughes, jr., Theodore S. Kenyon, Frederick P. Keppel, Russell H. Loines, Richard K. McGonigal, Benjamin F. McGuckin, Amos J. Peaslee, William E. Russell, Thomas D. Thacher, Edwin H. Updike, Lester H. Washburn.

I wish to call especial attention to the fact that Charles E. Hughes, jr., son of the Republican candidate for the Presidency, is a member of the committee on national affairs of this club, which prepared and circulated this pamphlet.

Furthermore, in the New Orleans Item, a newspaper published by Mr. Thompson, our distinguished Speaker's son-in-law, appeared the following editorial on April 18, 1916:

THE WATER-POWER FIGHT.

The group of conservationists, in all parties, of the type of those who wrecked the Taft administration by exposing the evil alliances and practices under the secretaryship of Ballinger, are up in arms against the Shields' water-power bill which has passed the Senate and now pends, awaiting a conference committee's action on it and a House substitute.

Gifford Pinchot, who led the fight against Ballinger, says of the Shields' bill:

"According to its own supporters, this bill turns over to the power interests of the country water power equivalent to twice the mechanical power of every kind now used in the United States, or enough to meet the needs of 200,000,000 people. This it does in perpetuity, although pretending to limit the grant to 50 years!"

Mr. Pinchot points out that the Shields' bill exacts from water-power companies no compensation for the power they obtain, requires no royalties—does nothing whatsoever, in actual effect, except to surrender to private corporations the remaining water-power sites over which the Federal Government has control!

Arrayed against the conservationists are: First, the water-power corporations have already "spotted" the power sites; second, the people in the regions of the proposed developments, impatient for development at any cost, and angered at the radical conservationists who have kept private enterprise from developing and have not been able to provide for public development.

Mr. Pinchot charges that the water-power grabbers themselves have prevented the passage of eight measures in eight years, providing for fair and equitable private development under proper restrictions and with proper compensation.

"They have wanted it all or none; done their way or not at all!"

We are far from the regions where water power is immediately significant with us—but we are right where we suffer most from a national water-power and water-flow policy that is unwise and basically wrong, for a very great proportion of the water that falls in the United States sends its surplus "run off" this way to the sea.

One of the ugly features of the Wilson administration has been the collapse of the fine pledges and great promises given concerning a "broad and comprehensive policy of conserving and utilizing the natural resources of the Nation!"

The Reclamation Service has been politicalized and largely "pork barrel."

The water-power question has wound up in an ugly snarl.

The Forest Service has been left unhelped.

We had looked for better things than this.

I insert the following resolution, which I introduced to-day, as a part of my remarks:

Resolution.

Whereas our water powers should be developed to the fullest extent that may be practicable at an early date, not only in a manner which the Nation alone can make possible, but should be held for the benefit of the people under conditions which will insure of the common right a fair return for privileges granted; and

Whereas two indefensible water-power measures affecting the remains of the natural resources of the United States known as the Shields water-power bill and the Myers water-power bill, are now pending in Congress; and

Whereas these two bills are efforts to give away the natural patrimony to private individuals and companies while the attention of the Nation is largely preoccupied in its foreign relations and its presidential elections; and

Whereas it is claimed by many, and evidence supporting such claim has been submitted to the House of Representatives, that a pernicious lobby has been in the Capitol working for the passage of these measures:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Speaker appoint a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives, any vacancy occurring on the committee to be filled in the same manner as the original appointment, to inquire into and report to Congress at the earliest practicable date, not later than the 1st of January, 1917, whether or not such a lobby exists, and, if so, what measures should be taken to punish the guilty parties or party; and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerks, stenographers and messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said committee was created. The committee shall have the power, through subcommittee or otherwise, to examine witnesses, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the House, on the audit and order of the chairman of said committee, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon the disbursing officer of the House as to the correctness of the accounts of the committee.

WHITE EARTH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file an additional report on the bill (H. R. 14731) relating to the White Earth Indian Reservation. (H. Rept. 993, pt. 2.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks leave to file a supplemental report on the White Earth Indian Reservation matter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. CLAUDE WEAVER.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Claude Weaver, the present efficient postmaster of Oklahoma City, recently delivered a speech here in Washington before the national convention of postmasters. It is so characteristic of his eloquence, his ability as an entertaining speaker, that it richly deserves a place in the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. For two years in this historic Hall he served not alone his State but his Nation ably and well. He honored the rôle of a Congressman then as he now honors the rôle of a postmaster.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered recently in Washington by ex-Congressman Claude Weaver, of my State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by an ex-Member of the House from Oklahoma, Mr. Claude Weaver. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. About what?

Mr. FERRIS. For the good of the order, I guess. It was before the postmasters' convention here in the city.

Mr. MANN. A political speech?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I think it is not a political speech.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what he would deliver a speech of any other kind for, because that was purely a political gathering.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. Weaver said:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, fellow postmasters, fellow workers, and fellow Democrats, you see that nobody takes me seriously. When I have come from the far-away, great Southwest—from the beautiful plains of God's Commonwealth, Oklahoma—to deliver a message worth while, your chairman, in introducing me, said, "He will make a very short speech." His suggestion intimates that brevity is the soul of wit. In Oklahoma we would say, "Cut her short." [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I have had a lot of ambitions from my boyhood days. I fully realize the exalted public place that I now hold. I started toward it long ago under the heliotrope skies of Texas, where Albert Burleson and I grew up together. Among the ambitions that I cherished was to be like Sancho Panza, the governor of an island, or like Huck Finn, to be shipwrecked on an island, or like Monte Cristo, to have a cave of buried treasure. I had dreams of being President or Senator, but my crowning ambition, now realized, was to be a postmaster. We know what we are, but we know not what we may be. [Applause.]

I will tell you a little incident that occurred in the greatest post office in the Southwest. Not long ago, on a certain Sunday morning when I sat at my desk, as all good postmasters do on Sunday morning, a long-distance call came to me from a man in Guthrie, Okla., who was making a long automobile trip from Kansas and had got stalled in the deep sands in the streets of Guthrie, about 30 miles from Oklahoma City. My good friend, Frank Oldsmith, postmaster at Guthrie, will verify my statements. The man said he had important letters in the general delivery of the Oklahoma City post office; that he was coming down on the noon train, but would not stop, but would go through to Ardmore having abandoned his automobile; that the letters had money greatly needed, and asked me to send a special messenger to the depot to meet the train and give him his letters. I told him that Oklahoma was a Christian land, and Oklahoma City a dry town, and that the post office on Sunday was hermetically sealed; and that his request was out of the question; but there was something in the urgent and pathetic tone of his voice that softened my heart. So I finally told him that there would be some one at the train to meet him with the letters. The man's name was Peck. A few minutes before train time I took the letters and went down to the station. When the train pulled in I saw a very large man of imposing appearance step from the Pullman. He had that opulent air of prosperity that all the people of Kansas have and on his shirt front a diamond as big as a carbuncle. With the discrimination of a Sherlock Holmes, I marked my man. I let him sweat a little while, and then I walked up to him and asked him if he were Mr. Peck. "Yes," he said. "Well," I said, "here are the letters for you." "Well," he said, "young man, you must have the most accommodating postmaster in the world down here." [Applause.] He said, "Son, here's a quarter for you." [Laughter and applause.] And the boys say that the only apocryphal part of my story is that I gave him back the quarter. [Laughter.]

Now, let me tell you another little story, and this also, like all of my stories, is a true story. You know that I grew up at the knees of a Christian mother, and moreover, at the University of Texas, in eighteen hundred and ever so long ago, I sat like another Paul at the feet of Gamaliel to listen to words of wisdom from the lips of old Oran M. Roberts, the old alcalde of Texas. So, you see that I could not be anything but a bubbling fountain of truth. Gen. Burleson has just told you that he is proud of his ancestry; that he is Scotch. I tell you that Albert Burleson has a nobler ancestry than the proudest Scotch lineage, and so have I. We are descended from the loins of the men who were pioneer founders of Texas, with its glorious memories of the Alamo and San Jacinto.

But to my story: Four years ago I was seized with a renewed attack of intermittent but insatiable ambition cherished from my boyhood days to be a Representative of the people out yonder in the Nation's great Capitol. So I made a pious pilgrimage to the shrines of the mighty, and, believe me, I had an inspiring message for them. I would to God, my fellow Democrats, that I could deliver that message to the American people to-day. I was out in the little town of Erick, in western Oklahoma, where they have the finest people in the world, and I had occasion to quote a little poetry and a great deal of Scripture. I had a catalogue of all the omissions and commissions, misdemeanors and crimes, of a certain political party that I will not name. Of course, I did not forget the crime of 1876, when they stole the Presidency of these United States from the American people—a bolder theft than that of the Promethean robber who stole the fire from heaven and hid it in a hollow reed. [Applause.] I had a lot of inspiring quotations from the Scriptures, and among those that appealed most was when I spoke of the fleshpots of Egypt and the savory smell of Esau's mess of pottage. You know we had been wandering in the wilderness for 16 long years, and you know how savory was the smell of pottage in Esau's nostrils. [Laughter and applause.] Another text that was of special interest was one that I took from the parable of the prodigal son, "He was an hungered and would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat." And then I told them about the swine that were possessed of devils and all plunged headlong into the sea. [Laughter and applause.] Then I told them the story of the good Samaritan. The American people represent the traveler that fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment and left him for dead. I pictured them waylaid by the robber, described the passing by of the priest and the Levite, and then came the great Democratic Party of this Nation, the true type of the good Samaritan, to pour oil into the wounds of the stricken and fallen. [Applause.]

Well, I had another Scripture. You know about four years ago, in the glorious revolution of 1912, they had an ancient Hebrew text, recently discovered—I don't mention names, but by the discoverer of the River of Doubt—"Thou shalt not steal." When I finished my speech and stood in the receiving line, there was an ancient and withered female dressed in yellow—no, ladies are never either very ancient or withered. She was beautiful and blooming, and shook hands with me, patted me on the head, and said: "Young man, I have sure enjoyed your sermon powerful." [Laughter and applause.]

How long have I talked? [To this question there were cries of "Go ahead, keep on," followed by applause.] All right. I would sure enough like to make a regular Texas or Oklahoma speech. I want to talk about a rather delicate subject if you will allow me to do it. They say "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Let me say a few words about the postmaster in politics, and now I want to give you some sound counsel and good advice. When you get inside of your office that is where politics should stop. When you cross the threshold of your office as a representative and servant of all the American people—rich or poor, Democrat, Republican, Bull Moose, Progressive, anarchist, Socialist, negro or white man—when you cross the threshold, never let politics enter. [Applause.] I had not been in the office long—we had not had a Democratic postmaster there for 16 years, and I had just got promoted from a position as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee to help write that Glass-Owen currency bill, and my reward was the postmastership at Oklahoma City. A lot of the boys thought there should be a lot of radical changes instanter. They came to me and said, "There are a couple of men holding important positions here, supervisory positions, who actually are Republicans." "Well, is that so?" I said. "Now," I said "let's see about that. Whenever you bring a serious charge against anybody, one that reflects on his standing in the community, and one that might injure his good name, you should have evidence to support it. You know the grand jury will not indict a man unless the truth is evident or the presumption great, so unless you have some good reason why they should be removed, why, just let them stay." I would not let them talk politics in the office, but I watched them very closely and kept a close check on them and especially on these two men. My example bore fruit, and I have succeeded in stamping out politics in my office. I will not make proselytes in politics in the Oklahoma City post office, nor allow anyone else to do it, but I believe in setting a good example to the boys, so in due time I went to the polls and registered as a good, orthodox Democrat, and I have heard that one of those "suspects" registered himself as a Democrat, and the other one—why he will hold his job just as long as he is efficient while I am postmaster. He can stay there because he is under civil service and he can stay there because, under the Democratic administration, merit and not political service is the true test. The sole motto of the Postal Department of the United States as now administered is "efficiency." [Great applause.]

Now, here is something worth going into the record. Nothing I have said up to date is worth it. It is a line or two regarding the postal system, and I wrote it down. I will just read it to you. Now listen.

"The Post Office System is essentially a business institution. It touches every home, comes in contact with every commercial institution and with those engaged in every line of industrial enterprise throughout the country, and in the nature of things it is highly important that only the most efficient employees should be in its service. For this reason the merit system should be adhered to in the Post Office Department above all others, in order to secure the very highest standard of efficiency in the conduct of its affairs. The service has been administered for the convenience of the public, not for profit; to promote efficiency by standardizing and simplifying procedure; to recognize merit and eliminate partisanship; to extend service wherever present or prospective returns justify; reduce rates in so far as proves consistent with fiscal necessity and to provide all communities and sections of the country as far as practicable with uniform service."

Now, that is worth all the speeches that have been delivered to this gathering, and I quote from Albert Sidney Burleson, the Postmaster General of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, I must conclude; I am going to close, but I just want you to know my position. I am afraid you might not know just what my politics are. [Laughter.] You know I claim I have improved the definition of a Democrat. One of the greatest statesman, one of the greatest Democrats in all this country, in an article in a metropolitan journal of New York City, defined the word "democrat" to be a man who believed in the rule of the people. But I can give you a better definition: A Democrat is a man who believes in the rule of the people and votes the Democratic ticket. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, do not think for a moment that when I took the oath of office as postmaster of Oklahoma City before M. O. Chance, that I surrendered either my citizenship or my Democracy. [Applause.] Whenever I have to lose my citizenship, the birthright of a Texan and an American for the paltry bribe of any office, why, then, I have sunk so low that I want my own brown-eyed boy, the image of his mother, beautiful as the dream of morning, to disown his father. [Loud cheering and applause.] I am going to conclude now by telling you of a speech that I heard in my brief and ephemeral career as a Representative in the United States Congress that has now gone down to the utter oblivion that hastens to engulf us all. I was up here at the White House as an invited guest on the 3d day of October, 1913, to see the President of the United States sign the tariff bill. He signed it with two pens, giving one to OSCAR UNDERWOOD and one to Senator SIMMONS. He then got up just as I am standing up here now, just to talk without any memorandum in his hand. He just said what was in his heart, and here is what he said. Now, I thought I knew what he would say—the first Democratic President since the immortal Grover Cleveland—the first piece of great constructive legislation with the income tax as the backbone of the Underwood tariff law written and signed; and I thought he would say what you would say, Brother Singleton, or what you would say, Colin Selph, what any ordinary man would say, I thought he would just say what the party had done in thus redeeming its pledges to the American people, but here is what he said. He said, "I feel like a man that has reached, just reached the halfway house. We have signed the tariff bill, but what about the currency bill? I feel like a man that goes down to sleep in a halfway house to rest, but to continue his journey in the morning." And then I thought myself away out in the mountains of Colorado—you know that little stream that runs down Pikes Peak, clear as crystal, with its fountain head in the melting snows that rise above the halfway house, with the incense of the wild roses and the violets, where the great white columbine blooms on the snow-clad cliff—just a little pine house—the halfway house, and above it the eternal snows and the glaciers. That was the vision of the President of the United States.

In conclusion, I will stand here to-day and challenge all this world when they go to take the work—the Underwood tariff law, the Clayton antitrust law, the Trades Commission law, the Smith-Lever agricultural bill, the good-roads bill, the settling of the Colorado coal strike, the settling of the Minnesota copper strike, the Glass-Owen Federal Reserve Act (ROBERT L. OWEN, the great Indian Senator; CARTER GLASS, the great Virginia statesman, and God in His omnipotence might have made a finer man, but in His omnipotence He never did make a finer man than CARTER GLASS)—to put their finger on a flaw. [Applause.]

Now, in conclusion, just one little story. I was in a theater in Kansas City years ago and there was a little country girl that came out on the stage—

"She had a rustic woodland air,
And she was wildly clad.
Her eyes were fair and very fair;
Her beauty made me glad."

She had been sent by her father, a farmer, to go to one of the fine finishing schools that Bob Ingersoll said was a place where pebbles are polished and diamonds are dimmed. There was a villain in the play who wanted to lead the little country girl away from the path of her duty, and she looked up to him with her wise, solemn country way and said, "There ain't no use and their ain't no sense in doing nothin' for nobody what never don nothin' for you." [Applause.] Go home, my countrymen, my fellow citizens, my fellow workers, my fellow postmasters, and remember that the greatest good to all the people of the nations of this earth is the reelection, thank God, of Woodrow Wilson. [Loud cheers and applause.]

FLOODS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 298) providing for the relief of flood sufferers in the State of West Virginia.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of persons suffering by reason of the recent floods on the waters of Cabin and Paint Creeks, the Kanawha, Mud, and Coal Rivers, in West Virginia. The Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe from time to time, is authorized to expend such sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in relieving destitution and caring for the injured and homeless who are suffering from the result of said flood and providing sanitary conditions; and he shall keep account of his expenditures hereunder and shall report the same to Congress, and shall, as far as possible, cooperate with local and State authorities, relief associations, and organizations, and he may use any Army tents, equipment, or supplies which he may deem proper in affording adequate and immediate relief.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be immediately considered.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know the reason why.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, first I want the Clerk to read a telegram from the governor of the State.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., August 13, 1916.

Hon. ADAM B. LITTLEPAGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Have just returned from visit through Cabin Creek and Coal River districts. Newspaper reports of the situation are not exaggerated, except possibly in loss of life, which is approximately 75. More than 5,000 people are homeless and without food and clothing. Thirty to fifty thousand dollars is needed for immediate relief work. I have issued an appeal to people of the State for funds. Provisions are being distributed effectively through heroic efforts of 500 men of West Virginia National Guard. West Virginia will be glad to receive any aid from the Federal Government in this disaster, the most destructive in the history of the State.

H. D. HATFIELD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia that the purpose he desires to accomplish can better be accomplished by simply enlarging the scope of the resolution that was recently passed in regard to the flood situation in other States, so as to include West Virginia. I understand that a movement to that effect will take place in the Senate to-day. In all these cases the experience of the Committee on Appropriations has been that there is appropriated a very much greater sum than is necessary. There was something over $500,000 that was appropriated for the relief of the flood sufferers of the South, and an enlargement of that law so as to include the State of West Virginia, I am sure, would take care of the situation. I make that suggestion to the gentleman in the hope of aiding him, because I shall feel compelled, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to prevent the present consideration of the resolution in the form in which it has been presented.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky that my information is that the Senate committee recommended $100,000 in a resolution worded exactly as this one is, and that there is a great necessity existing in that district in the entire community where this cloud-burst occurred. A great many people lost their lives and all the property they had, and there is necessity for immediate action on the part of Congress if it is inclined to do anything.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, he gets just as quick action, he gets the funds made available for other purposes, including West Virginia. That is practically the quicker way to do it.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. But the House does not meet until Friday.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will let the matter pass over and subsequently offer a resolution enlarging the scope of the former resolution which we have passed, making it include West Virginia, there will be no trouble.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I am sure that if we do that we will not get action in the House to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. For the present, Mr. Speaker, I object.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 15947), and I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

"Except as herein otherwise provided, hereafter the age for retirement of all officers of the Navy shall be 64 years instead of 62 years as now prescribed by law.

The amendment requires that within 30 days after the completion of the new track connection with the navy yard, the railroad company shall, at its own expense, remove said existing track connection and restore and make the service of the streets satisfactory to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the House recedes with amendments whereby the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. shall remove at its own expense the existing tract connection east of the west building line of Second Street east. And the House recedes.

Amendment No. 89: Provides for a reorganization of the commissioned personnel of the Navy and provides for promotion of officers in the grades of the line by selection of commander to captain and from captain to rear admiral. The Senate amendment provides that the selection for promotion is to be made by a board of 9 flag officers of the line of the Navy, to be appointed from the first 12 on the list of rear admirals. Officers who have had not less than three years' service in the grade are eligible for selection; no officer is to be promoted unless he received the recommendation of not less than seven members of said board. After selection, the officers recommended for promotion are required to pass the required examinations for promotion as under existing law. The number of officers in the various grades of the line were fixed by the Senate amendment as follows: Four per cent of the total enlisted strength of the active list authorized by law is allowed for line officers, to be distributed in the proportion of 1½ in the grade of rear admiral, to 4 in the grade of captain, to 8 in the grade of commander, to 14 in the grade of lieutenant commander, to 31½ in the grade of lieutenant, to 40 in the grades of lieutenant (junior grade) and ensign, inclusive. The Senate amendment provides that the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps amount to sixty-five one-hundredths of the total number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, while the Pay Corps consists of 12 per cent of the line; the Construction Corps, 5 per cent of the line; and the Corps of Civil Engineers, 2 per cent of the line, distributed in the various grades of the corps as follows: In the Medical Corps, 1½ deputy surgeon generals with the rank of rear admiral to 4 medical directors with the rank of captain, to 8 medical inspectors, to 18 surgeons, to 86½ in the grades below surgeon. The Pay Corps was allowed 1½ deputy paymasters general with the rank of rear admiral to 4 pay directors with the rank of captain, to 8 pay inspectors, to 86½ in the grades below pay inspector. In the Construction Corps, 1½ naval constructors with the rank of rear admiral to 8½ naval constructors with the rank of captain, to 14 naval constructors with the rank of commander, to 76 naval constructors and assistant naval constructors with the rank below commander. Corps of Civil Engineers, 1½ civil engineers with the rank of read admiral to 5½ civil engineers with the rank of captain, to 14 civil engineers with the rank of commander, to 79 civil engineers and assistant civil engineers with the rank below commander. Chaplains, 1½ chaplains with the rank of rear admiral to 5½ with the rank of captain, to 14 with the rank of commander, to 79 chaplains and acting chaplains with the rank below commander.

The Senate amendment, based upon authorized enlisted strength of 74,700 enlisted men, would ultimately give to the line of the Navy 2,988 officers, which would allow 45 rear admirals, 120 captains, and 239 commanders. The Pay Corps would ultimately be allowed 359 officers, 6 with the rank of rear admiral, 14 with the rank of captain, and 29 with the rank of commander. The Construction Corps would be allowed 149 officers, 3 with the rank of rear admiral, 13 with the rank of captain, and 21 with the rank of commander. The Corps of Civil Engineers would be allowed 60 officers, 2 having the rank of rear admiral, 3 the rank of captain, and 8 the rank of commander. Chaplains, 81 officers, 1 with the rank of rear admiral, 8 with the rank of captain, 16 with the rank of commander. Medical Corps, 653 officers, 11 with the rank of rear admiral, 26 with the rank of captain, and 52 with the rank of commander.

The Senate amendment also provided increased pay for the commissioned warrant officers from that of ensign to lieutenant (junior grade) after 6 years' service, to lieutenant after 12 years' service without increase of rank. The Senate amendment also provided an increased rank to the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) in the grade to which the commissioned chief belonged after 6 years' service as a commissioned warrant officer, provided that he pass a satisfactory examination before a board composed of 3 line officers not below the rank of lieutenant commander.

The House recedes with an amendment striking out all of the Senate amendment after the caption, and in lieu thereof substituted a provision whereby promotion in the line of the Navy is to be made by selection only, the selection to be made by a board of nine rear admirals of the line of the Navy appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to be convened during the month of December of each year for the purpose of recommending officers for promotion. Each member of the board is required to take oath that he will, without prejudice or partiality, and having in view solely the special fitness of officers and the efficiency of the naval service, perform the duties imposed upon him.

The board is to be furnished with the number of vacancies in the grades of rear admiral, captain, and commander to be filled during the following calendar year and with the names of all officers who are eligible for consideration for selection, together with the record of each officer on file at the Navy Department. Any officer who is eligible for consideration for selection has the right to forward through official channels a written communication inviting attention to any matter of record in the Navy Department concerning himself which he deems important in the consideration of his case. No captain, commander, or lieutenant commander shall be recommended for selection who has had less than four years' service in his grade. The board shall recommend for promotion the exact number of officers in each grade equal to the number of vacancies to be filled in the next higher grade during the following calendar year, and no officer shall be recommended for promotion unless he shall have received the recommendation of not less than six members of said board.

The report of the board shall be in writing, signed by all the members, and shall certify that the board has carefully considered the case of every officer eligible for consideration and that in the opinion of at least six of the members of said board the officers therein recommended are the best fitted of all those under consideration to assume the duties of the next higher grade.

The report of the board shall be submitted to the President for approval or disapproval. In case any officer or officers recommended by the board are not acceptable to the President, the board shall be so informed, with the name of such officer or officers and the board shall further recommend a number of officers equal to the number of those found not acceptable to the President. Upon the approval of the recommendations of the board by the President, the officers recommended therein shall, prior to promotion, be subject in all respects to the examination prescribed by law for officers promoted by seniority, and in the case of the failure of any officer to pass the required professional examination, such officer shall thereafter be ineligible for selection and promotion.

On and after June 30, 1920, no captain, commander, or lieutenant commander shall be promoted unless he has had not less than two years' actual sea service on seagoing ships in the grade in which serving or who is more than 56, 50, or 45 years of age, respectively. Captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders who become ineligible for promotion on account of age shall be retired on a percentage of pay equal to 2½ per cent of their shore-duty pay for each year of service, provided that the total retired pay of any officer shall not exceed 75 per cent of the shore-duty pay he would be entitled to receive were he on the active list. Except where otherwise provided, the retiring age hereafter is set at 64 years instead of 62, as now prescribed by law.

The total number of line officers in the Navy is fixed at 4 per cent of the total enlisted strength, which will ultimately authorize 2,988 officers of the line. These officers are distributed in the proportion of 1 of the grade of rear admiral to 4 in the grade of captain, to 7 in the grade of commander, to 14 in the grade of lieutenant commander, to 32½ in the grade of lieutenant, to 41½ in the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) and ensign, inclusive, and requires that lieutenants (junior grade) shall have not less than three years' service in that grade before being eligible for promotion to the grade of lieutenant, and that the increase in the number of captains shall be made at a rate of not more than 10 captains in any one year.

The officers of the various staff corps are fixed at the following percentages of the total number of commissioned line officers: Pay Corps, 12 per cent; Construction Corps, 5 per cent; Corps of Civil Engineers, 2 per cent; and of the Medical Corps, sixty-five hundredths of 1 per cent of the total authorized number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, including midshipmen, Hospital Corps, prisoners undergoing sentence of discharge, enlisted men detailed for duty with the Naval Militia, and the Flying Corps. Officers of the staff corps are advanced up to and including the rank of lieutenant commander with the officers of the line with whom or next after whom they take precedence under existing law. The officers in the various staff corps are distributed as follows:

Medical Corps: One-half medical directors with the rank of rear admiral to 4 medical directors with the rank of captain, to 8 medical inspectors with the rank of commander, to 87½ in the grades below medical inspector.

Pay Corps: One-half pay directors with the rank of rear admiral to 4 pay directors with the rank of captain, to 8 pay inspectors with the rank of commander, to 87½ in the grades below inspector.

Construction Corps: One-half naval constructors with the rank of rear admiral to 8½ naval constructors with the rank of captain, to 14 with the rank of commander, to 77 naval constructors and assistant naval constructors with the rank below commander.

Corps of Civil Engineers: One-half civil engineers with the rank of rear admiral to 5½ civil engineers with the rank of captain, to 14 civil engineers with the rank of commander, to 80 civil engineers and assistant civil engineers with the rank below commander.

The amendment abolishes the corps of professors of mathematics and retains the provision of the Senate amendment whereby when there is an odd number of officers in the grade or rank of rear admiral in the line or staff corps the lower division thereof shall include the excess in number, except where there is but one; also the provision that the pay and allowances of the officers of the upper half of the grade of rear admiral shall be that now allowed by law for the first nine rear admirals.

Additional pay and allowances is granted chief warrant officers, but no increase in rank.

The effect of the amendment to the Senate amendment is to reduce the number of officers in the highest grades of the Navy, both line and staff. The Senate amendment provided for 45 rear admirals of the line ultimately, and the amendment agreed to provides for 30. In the Pay Corps the number of rear admirals is reduced from 6 to 2; in the Construction Corps, from 3 to 1; Civil Engineers, from 2 to 1; chaplains, from 1 to none; Medical Corps, from 11 to 3. The Senate amendment provided ultimately for 68 rear admirals of the line and staff; the amendment agreed to reduces that number to 37, 7 of which are in the staff corps. The effect of the amendment agreed to is to immediately increase the number of rear admirals in the line from 18 to 21, and in about five or six years to ultimately reach 30.

Amendment No. 90: Provides that officers of the line of the Navy may specialize for engineering duty only when not below the rank of lieutenant commander, and the House recedes with an amendment limiting it not below the grade of lieutenant.

Amendments Nos. 91 and 92: Are changes of phraseology without any legal effect.

Amendments Nos. 93 and 94: Strike out the word "acting" as a grade for ensigns performing engineering duty only. And the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 95: Inserts the word "regularly" relating to the commission of lieutenants for engineering duty only. And the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 96: Allows appointees from civil life for engineering duty only to qualify for the general duties of the line. And the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 97: Strikes out the House provision that officers appointed from civil life for engineering duties only shall be eligible for advancement to the higher grades in the same manner as provided for line officers assigned to engineering duty only. And the Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 98 and 99: Strike out of the House provision the clause whereby an officer or enlisted man shall not receive pay for the period of any absence due to his misconduct. And the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 100: Provides for the payment of six months' pay gratuity to the mother of the late William Orr, fireman in the United States Navy. And the House recedes with an amendment providing that the six months' pay shall be less expenses of interment.

The Senate amendment excludes retired officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, or the officers and enlisted men of the Organized Naval Militia in the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, and further provides that no such retired officer shall be checked in his pay due to any construction of section 6 prior to the passage of this act. Amendment No. 108: Strikes out the House provision for the Naval Flying Corps and inserts a provision similar to the House provision whereby the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to appoint annually in the line of the Navy and Marine Corps for a period of two years following the passage of this act in the order of merit as determined by competitive examination 15 acting ensigns or acting second lieutenants for the performance of aeronautical duties only. Persons so appointed must be citizens of the United States and may be appointed from warrant officers or enlisted men of the naval service or from civil life, and must at the time of appointment be not less than 18 nor more than 24 years of age. The appointment shall be for a probationary period of three years and may be revoked at any time. The provision further provides for the detail of officers from the Regular Navy for duty in aircraft, the total number of officers being 150 and enlisted men 350.

Acting ensigns and acting second lieutenants upon the completion of the probationary period of three years may be appointed acting lieutenants (junior grade) and acting first lieutenants, respectively, such appointments to be for a probationary period of four years. After the completion of the probationary period of four years they may be commissioned in the grade of lieutenant of the line of the Navy or captain of the Marine Corps for aeronautical duties only, and may qualify for the regular duties of the line of the Navy and of the Marine Corps, respectively. Upon completion of the probationary period of four years, two years of which shall have been on regular duties of the line, they may be commissioned in the grade of lieutenant of the line of the Navy or captain of the Marine Corps. And the House recedes with an amendment providing that they shall be commissioned in the line of the Navy or Marine Corps according to their length of service.

Provision is also made for the detailing of officers and enlisted men as student aviators to the extent of not more than 30 student flyers annually for a period of four years from enlisted men of the naval service and from citizens of the United States, who shall receive the same pay and allowances as midshipmen of the United States Naval Academy. Persons so appointed must be not less than 17 nor more than 21 years of age. The appointment of student flyers shall continue in force for two years, unless sooner revoked by the Secretary of the Navy. At the end of two years student flyers may be examined for qualifications as qualified aviators. After qualifying, student flyers receive the pay of midshipmen plus 50 per cent thereof, and may be commissioned acting ensigns for aeronautical duties only after three years' service. Provision is also made whereby aeronautic schools for instruction and training of student flyers is authorized. And the House recedes.

The rates of pay proposed are in accordance with the rates provided by law for the members of the National Guard. In order that any member of the Naval Militia may receive the pay prescribed in the amendment, he must be enrolled in the new organization called the National Naval Volunteers. The creation of this organization is to effect the practical Federalization of the Naval Militia so that they may be called upon to perform the duties beyond the continental limits of the United States in time of war or in an emergency determined by the President of the United States. The status of the officers and enlisted men remains the same as under the terms of the Naval Militia act, approved February 16, 1914, excepting that the term for the enlistment is three years with the privilege of extending the enlistment for one, two, or three years longer, and in order that the officers and the men may draw the pay prescribed under the terms of this amendment, the number of drills has been materially increased over the act of February 16, 1914.

The bill also provides for a system of administration of justice and discipline in the Naval Militia. The amendment changes the existing law in only three major particulars: First, the creation of the National Naval Volunteers; second, the increase in pay to correspond with the pay of National Guard; and third, provisions for the discipline and administration of justice. There are other minor changes, but are not of such a nature as to materially change existing law. And the House recedes with minor amendments.

The amendment also provides for the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of aviation stations under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury not exceeding 10 in number along the coasts of the United States as may be deemed advisable, and to detail in connection therewith officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard. One of these stations may be maintained exclusively for the purpose of special instruction, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to employ one instructor in aeronautics at a salary of $4,000 per annum and one assistant instructor at a salary of $3,000 per annum. L. P. PADGETT,
J. FRED. C. TALBOTT,
ALBERT ESTOPINAL,
THOMAS S. BUTLER,
ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on that motion I will ask the gentleman to yield me 10 minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted to me I desire to call to the attention of the House what might honestly be termed the grossest extravagance possible and the rankest inefficiency for any committee to display in bringing this personnel legislation before the House as it does. I do not want to be characterized as a naval economist, because you all know that I have worked consistently for a big Navy, but the conferees have brought to the House in this conference report something which the Navy does not desire, and legislation which should not be forced upon the Government. It is rank extravagance to force the House to adopt the committee's report in this respect, throwing away $202,500 per annum in retirement pay for all time to come, when the paragraph on page 8 establishing the age limit for retirement for captains goes into effect on June 30, 1920. In a few words, let me show you what the conferees have agreed to, and they have agreed to this notwithstanding the fact that Admiral Badger, chairman of the Navy General Board, before our committee this year said that in 1920, when our present construction program is completed, we will be short in line officers alone 1,100 men. Think of it! In 1920, when this section goes into effect, we will be short 1,100 officers in the line of the Navy, and in this conference agreement they establish an age limit of 56 years for the retirement of captains who have not been promoted to the rank of rear admiral!

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the age limit now?

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no age limit now respecting the retirement of captains, other than the general age limit of 62 years. You and I know, as does anyone who has ever seen a naval officer, that a man of 56 years is in the prime of life and capable of delivering to the Government the very best that is in him, and we should retain him in the service.

Let me tell you what that little paragraph establishing 56 years as the age limit for captains does. It goes into effect June 30, 1920, and on that day there will be 65 captains who will be 56 years of age, only 11 of whom will have been promoted to the rank of rear admiral—not to exceed 12 in any event, and probably only 11. That leaves 54 captains to be retired at 56 years of age, at a cost to the Government of $202,500 per annum in retirement pay, when those men, in the prime of life, could be retained in the service for the additional amount that we pay to an ensign, or $1,250 a year. Yet it is proposed to retire 54 of them and put them on a pension for life. Some of them will get good jobs in shipbuilding companies and in munition plants at salaries ranging from $5,000 to $15,000 a year, and we are going to retire them when they desire to remain in the service for $1,250 a year more than their retirement pay.

Mr. COX. Who is to blame for that?

Mr. BRITTEN. I can only say to the gentleman that it is a case of rank Democratic inefficiency and extravagance.

Mr. COX. I am against it.

Mr. BRITTEN. And so am I. That is all there is to it. I have read the hearings. They have been most informal.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Are they retiring all these Democrats that they are retiring on a pension?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; and we will retire a great many more of them on next March 4 without a pension. [Laughter.] Here is the situation: These captains have survived 16 different sets of pluckings in the last 16 years. Their names have been before the plucking board 16 different times and carefully considered for retirement by that board, and each time they have been retained in the service because they were efficient, because they were delivering the best that was in them, which was excellent for the service, and now we are going to retire them because they have not been promoted to the rank of rear admiral prior to their reaching their fifty-seventh birthday. In the name of Heaven I can not understand how this thing was agreed to by the conferees. They had no hearings to speak of. I have read them all. Men who have come before our committee who have reached the age of 54, 55, and 56 years are in the very prime of life. There is no question about that. We could retain those men in the service for $1,250 a year more than their retirement pay.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. We have increased the number of entrants into the Naval Academy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why would it be necessary to do that if we did not have to retire men at the top? Why not keep the men who are there and let the Naval Academy run as it is?

Mr. BRITTEN. The answer is obvious. There is no reason for increasing the number of cadets at the academy, who will be turned out at the rate of 200 a year, and when the young men that you and I appoint this year and next year go into the service and grow to be captains, several hundred of them in a bunch, we will be able to promote only 10 or 12 of them to rear admirals, and what are we going to do with the rest? We will retire them at the age of 56 at a pension for life of $3,750 a year, and they will go out and get lucrative positions. Now, I certainly do not object if they can get lucrative positions after they are retired at a reasonable age or for cause, as it is perfectly proper that they should fill positions and go out in the world to assist in its upbuilding.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman call attention to the age limit of those officers below the rank of captain to be retired by the provision?

Mr. BRITTEN. If they have the rank of commander, it is at 50 years. Fifty years is not low for that rank, and there will be very few of those retired. The age of captain should be at least at 59 years. At 59 years there would be 19 retired in 1920, when this law goes into effect. If the conferees wanted to do something good for the Government and wanted to give the service that which it desires, they would take this retired list and carry on one side as special numbers and take these extra numbers and attach them to the training stations, navy yards, State militias, departmental duties—all work they can do and do very well, instead of retiring them. No one can say that is not a good proposition. Well, the conferees have gone ahead without a hearing, notwithstanding that in the committee we had been informed time and time again by our distinguished chairman, for whom I have the very highest respect, that when we would get into that subject we would take up the personnel legislation and full hearings would be had when admirals, captains, and experts in personnel legislation would be called before the committee and they would advise us completely. We all know there should be a revision of personnel legislation since the abolition of the plucking board; but coming in this fashion, I am sure, will not be good for the Government, because it is not what the service wants and it is not what the Government should have forced upon it. It is reckless extravagance, and is going to do the country and the service more harm than good.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BRITTEN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This question of the personnel is before Congress on the report of the committee of conference as an amendment. Was the question of the personnel gone into in the hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. BRITTEN. At times when the personnel was touched upon before the committee, the chairman would usually interrupt by saying that it was our intention to take up that legislation in detail later on when full hearings could be had.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the Committee on Naval Affairs ever have a full hearing on that question?

Mr. BRITTEN. They never have, and I venture to say there are not five men in this House who understand the effect of this drastic clause in the conference report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House why such a vastly important matter, in one sense, is brought in before this House for the first time as an amendment on a conference report, the Committee on Naval Affairs never having investigated it?

Mr. BRITTEN. My dear sir, if I could answer the gentleman's question I would not be taking up the time of the House now. I am merely giving the House the opinion which I have derived and which I think is a perfectly good one. I venture to say, out of the 21 members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House to-day there are not 4 who understand the importance of this legislation in its drastic effect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Naval Committee of the Senate has had any hearings on this subject?

Mr. BRITTEN. The Naval Committee of the Senate has had no hearings on this subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it customary for a conference committee to have hearings?

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, I really do not know, because I have never been on a conference committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know any other instance of parliamentary procedure in this House where a conference committee has had hearings in the regular way? It is very unusual, is it not?

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman knows more about that; and if he says it is unusual, I take it to be the fact.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been here for 10 years, and I have never heard of hearings before a conference committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is nothing that can be done here to-day, as this conference report must be voted up or down without amendment.

I had hoped to amend the bill by either knocking out the age retirement section entirely or by raising the retirement age for captains to 59 years.

A captain should reach the rear admiral's grade in time to have 1 year in command of a division, 2 years in command of a fleet, 1 year otherwise employed; total, 5 years in grade.

With ultimate retirement at 64, he should, therefore, be promoted at 59.

Even if it were essential that our flag officers should have time for two tours in supreme command afloat, they would not have to be promoted younger than 57, and selection alone could always accomplish this. It is practically certain, however, that if they had eight years in the rear admiral's grade two or three of those years would be spent on some shore duty, which is now and could always be appropriately and equally well done by captains.

By looking further into the future and scanning the Navy Register it can be seen that the enforced retirements of captains at 56, if not promoted, although falling to about 4 or 5 in 1921, and remaining near those figures for several years, will again increase rapidly when classes of 200 or more are blocking each other for promotion to the rear admiral's grade.

If compulsory retirement of captains not promoted June 30, 1920, were raised from 56 to 59 there would be about 19 instead of 50 so retired.

This would increase the time of an officer in the captain's grade from 6 years to 9 years, giving him 2 years to command a second-line battleship or armored cruiser; 2 years to command a first-line battleship (dreadnaught); 4 years for commandantcy, head of boards and bureaus, and other shore-command duty; 1 year for leave, casualty, possible sickness, or special service; total, 9 years in grade.

Captains can not be selected for promotion, according to the amendment, until they have had four years in grade. If they must retire at 56 they will have only six years altogether in grade (promoted from commander at 50), and selection can only be made from the upper third of the grade. If they retire at 59, selection can extend to more than half of them.

After 1920 they must also have had 2 years' sea service in their grade. There will then be 120 captains and about 40 captain's commands afloat. Only one-third of them at most could be given their cruise as soon as they entered the grade. Another third would have to wait two years, while the remaining third could not begin their cruise until four years after entering their grade, and, if their time in grade was limited to six years, could not finish in time to be eligible for selection. If their time in grade were nine years, or even seven, this contingency could not arise.

I desired to amend the age limit provision (64 years) for rear admirals so that those officers retired recently for age, who would have more than 18 months' service in the Navy under the new age limitation, should, upon written application to the Secretary of the Navy, be reinstated and carried as a special number in the line with the same rank, rating, and place they occupied upon retirement.

My object was to retain in the service such untiring officers as Fiske, Winslow, Howard, and Boush.

There can be no question concerning the honesty of purpose nor the great ability of Fiske and Winslow, and the recent retirement of Howard who has just covered himself and the Navy with glory by his masterly conduct on the Mexican west coast, would warrant his retention for two more short years.

As late as September 10, 1915, Admiral T. B. Howard, then in command of the Pacific Fleet off Mexico, received the following radiogram from Washington, D. C., which Congress and the country should hear:

U. S. S. COLORADO, San Diego, flag for Admiral T. B. Howard:

The department transmits by telegraph the following letter, and directs that it be published to the officers and men of the Pacific Fleet:

"As its commander in chief the department takes pleasure in commending you for your successful administration and command of that unit of the Navy.

"The uniform tact, skillful diplomacy, and marked ability that has characterized your relations with the warring factions in Mexico and with the representatives of other countries has always been in accordance with the highest traditions of the naval service during a period when conditions have been of a particularly trying and delicate nature.

"The department has always felt assured that it could rely on the officers and men under your command to maintain the prestige of the Navy and of the country, and it takes this opportunity to express its commendation of their loyalty and zeal in assisting you, their commander in chief and first admiral, in carrying out the policy so successfully pursued. 15010.

"JOSEPHUS DANIELS."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not know as I ever listened to a 10-minute speech that had more errors and inaccuracies than the one that has just been made. The gentleman said that the committee had no hearings. A year or so ago we had hearings, and here is the published volume on the question of the personnel.

Mr. GALLIVAN. How many pages?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know; 827 pages, I believe. Then before the conferees at the present time we had hearings embracing from 300 to 400 pages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Can the gentleman inform us what will be the increased cost to the Government by reason of the additional positions provided for in the personnel provision?

Mr. PADGETT. I will state to the gentleman that I can not give it to him exactly, but I will give it as near as I can. Now, the gentleman stated there would be 55 captains retired in 1920.

Mr. BRITTEN. Fifty-four.

Mr. PADGETT. Well, that just lacks one of being as many as 55.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that the date on the title page of this copy of the printed report of the hearings is December, 1913.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. That is true. Then, after——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is 1916, and there has been a House of Congress elected since that was printed.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; but the information given in there was such good information that it would keep.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, well, as to that statement of the gentleman, of course, the gentleman did not intend to mislead the House, but I understood these hearings were had before the committee in the present Congress.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Hearings in a previous Congress have no effect here.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes, they have. The information they gave is perfectly good. There are 300 pages.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. No; not now. I have the information. I have a letter here from Capt. McLean, the Judge Advocate General, who deals with that. I have a tabulated statement here, made out in detail. I will read. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, August 14, 1916.

DEAR MR. PADGETT: Pursuant to your request of the 12th instant, I have made an estimate of the operation of the amendment to the naval appropriation bill which relates to personnel, particularly with regard to the effect of the clause which requires that on and after June 30, 1920, captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders be retired on reaching the ages of 56, 50, and 45 years, respectively.

In making my estimate I found it necessary to make the following assumptions, and, though they are not mathematically accurate, it is believed that the results derived therefrom will be fairly approximate:

ASSUMPTIONS.

1 The number of officers in each grade being based, as they are, upon the total number of commissioned line officers in the Navy, I have begun with the number of line officers now on the active list (2,084). I have estimated the net increase per year among the commissioned line officers at 130 for the years 1917, 1918, 1919 (it being assumed that about 170 midshipmen and warrant officers would be commissioned ensigns during each of these years and that there would be approximately 40 casualties per year in the list). For the year 1920 I have estimated a net increase of 350, this being the first year during which the increased representation at Annapolis will be felt and also the first year in which the engineering specialists provided for in this bill will become commissioned officers. Subsequent to 1921 it is impracticable to estimate with any degree of accuracy whatever, on account of the fact that the graduating class may on that year for the first time be expected to more than fill the authorized list of line officers of the Navy based upon an estimated strength of 74,700. It does not seem probable that these excess officers will actually be discharged, hence it is impracticable to do more than hazard a guess that the enlisted strength of the Navy may before that date be further increased, thereby further increasing the authorized number of officers. Even if all officers who graduate in 1921 and subsequent years could be counted upon as being taken into the service, any estimate at the present time concerning the effect of compulsory retirement subsequent to that date (due to age in grade) would be too uncertain to be of any value—because of the fact that promotion by selection will by that time have been several years in operation and seniority will be a less accurate index to the age of the different officers than it is at the present time.

2. Computation of vacancies: In computing vacancies I have allowed only for those due to retirement for age, taking into account the extending of the age of retirement to 64. Though there will be casualties due to deaths, voluntary retirements, retirements for physical disabilities, etc., these will all have an effect toward stimulating promotion; in view of the very great uncertainty in making an estimate of probable casualties, where only a small number of officers are concerned (as is the case in each of the different grades), I considered it best to omit this source of vacancies altogether as my estimates might be challenged. Especially does this seem desirable in view of the fact that the tendency of all such vacancies will be to reduce the number of compulsory retirements in 1920.

3. Extra numbers: I gather from reading the amendment that extra numbers will remain extra numbers on promotion. For that reason all extra numbers have been omitted from my consideration.

4. Number of officers available for selection: In arriving at the effect of the age in grade clause, it must be remembered that no one can even approximately estimate who will be selected for promotion and who will not; therefore in working out my estimate I have found it convenient to deal with "the number of officers available for selection," meaning thereby the number of officers in each respective grade who had, on November 30 of that year, completed four years' service in grade. I think it may be safely assumed that, other things being equal, the board in making its selections will both favor an officer who is approaching the age limit in grade as well as give certain weight to seniority. Basing our estimate upon this assumption, if we begin with the junior officer in each grade who is available on December 1 of any year for promotion and count back up through the list a number of files equal to "the number of officers available for selection" on that date, we should obtain an approximate (though for above reasons not an absolutely accurate) estimate of the condition of the available list on any particular date in the next few years in regard to age.

TABLE SHOWING OPERATION OF PERSONNEL FEATURE.

I append hereto, marked "A," a table showing my estimate of the approximate operation of the personnel feature up to and including the year 1921, though, as above stated, the estimate for 1921 must be considered as a very rough approximation. I have endeavored to make the legends and remarks on the table sufficiently clear to enable you to understand them without difficulty.

Conclusions: December, 1919, is the last board of selection prior to the date upon which age in grade retirement goes into effect. The appended table shows, if the computations are correct, that after filling all vacancies which might now be certainly counted on as existing on December 1, 1919, and not allowing any casualties, there will remain in the several grades the following number of officers who have served four years in grade and are therefore available for selection: Captains 51, commanders 64, lieutenant commanders 91. Between December, 1919, and June 30, 1920, there will be two additional retirements, which will cause promotion and leave the available list in respective grades on June 30, 1920, as at captains 49, commanders 62, lieutenant commanders 89.

As above stated, there is no possible way of knowing who these officers remaining unselected on June 30, 1920, will be, and hence how old these officers will be, and hence what number of them will be retired for age on that date.

However, an examination of the present Navy list shows that of the captains now on the list who will on that date be available for selection, if not promoted prior to 1920, 33 will still be less than 56 years old when the age in grade retirement clause becomes effective, and these 33 are, generally speaking, the junior captains on the list. If, therefore, none of these junior captains are selected to that date, and if no casualties of any kind occur in the meantime, we could state definitely that 16 captains would be retired for age on June 30, 1920. Inasmuch as some of these 33 younger but junior captains will doubtless have been selected for retirement before that date, this would tend to increase the number of compulsory retirements above 16; on the other hand, casualties and voluntary retirements occurring on the captains' list between now and 1920 would decrease the number of officers available for selection and consequently tend to decrease the number of officers who would be compulsorily retired for age in grade. Though anything that may be said now must remain an estimate, it would seem that these two opposing tendencies would counteract each other, and it is therefore believed that 16 is as fair an estimate of the number of compulsory retirements in 1920 in the grade of captain as it is now practicable to make.

As for the 62 commanders, an examination of the list shows that only 3 of the 68 junior commanders as they appear on the list to-day, who will then be available for selection, will be 50 years old on June 30, 1920. While it would therefore be possible that three commanders would be retired for age, in view of this condition it would seem probable that no commanders would be retired for age in that year.

As for lieutenant commanders, the junior officer who will be available for promotion June 30, 1920, will be only 40 years old, and, counting up from him, there are 140 numbers on the list at the present time before reaching an officer who will be 45 years old on that date. Therefore it may be safely stated that no lieutenant commanders will be retired for age in 1920.

Summarizing the above, if my figures are correct, it is estimated that approximately 16 captains, possibly 3 commanders—but probably none—and no lieutenant commanders will be affected by age in grade retirement in 1920. It may be stated in the case of both the captains and commanders who might be affected that all of them will on that date have been available for selection in 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919. In other words, all who will on that date be subject to age in grade retirement have already served four years in grade and will be available for selection from the date of the passage of this bill.

Table subsequent to June 30, 1920: In the appendix I inclose a table running up through 1920 and 1921. In this table I have estimated 16 retirements in the grade of captain on June 30, 1920. I have not allowed any retirements from the grade of commander. In 1921 I have estimated two retirements for age from the grade of captain. This must necessarily be a guess, as no one can foretell who will be selected for promotion.

It is believed that the tables appended portray, with as fair a degree of approximation as can be done by omitting casualties, the operation of the personnel feature for the first few years. After it becomes fully operative, and after vacancies due to the gradual increase in the list of officers have been filled, there will necessarily be a considerable number of retirements for age in grade, as this is the only source whereby a flow of promotion can be created for the 3,000 commissioned line officers who will then be on the Navy list. The difference is that officers thus retire in the lower grades rather than being forced up through the grade of rear admiral, as has heretofore been the case.

Sincerely, yours,

RIDLEY MCLEAN,
Judge Advocate General.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to ask the gentleman a question along this line.

Mr. PADGETT. No. Let me finish, and then I will answer the gentleman's question.

Now, what is the fact and what is the condition at the present time? It is like one of these lifting or elevating stairways. A man gets on it when he graduates at Annapolis. He takes his position upon his class graduation, and then stays on there, and as it is lifted up he gets to be rear admiral. All he has to do is to keep from becoming court-martialed, and he becomes a rear admiral. The question of ability cuts no figure. He just gets into the line of that endless-chain uplift. We put on here a provision for selection—that they shall be selected and promoted for efficiency and for the advantage of the service.

Now, what is the case? Since 1898 there have been only three captains placed on the present retired list on account of age. We have 61 captains on the retired list to-day, and only 3 out of those 61 were put on there on account of retirement for age.

Mr. BRITTEN. What age?

Mr. PADGETT. At the age of 62. In the past the captains have practically all become rear admirals. We have something like 148 or 150 rear admirals on the retired list to-day, and we have 61 commodores that draw the same pay as rear admirals of the lower line. They are retired on $6,000 a year. Captains are retired on $3,750. We are simply putting in a provision here that men shall be retired as captains and not as rear admirals. [Applause.] Heretofore everybody has been becoming a rear admiral and going on the retired list at $6,000 a year.

It is not right; and we are putting on a provision here that some of them will retire as captains; and in 1920, four years from now, there will be 16 retired at $3,750 a year instead of between now and then all of them being retired as rear admirals at $6,000 a year. [Applause.] That is a reform we are making in the administration of the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. How could they be retired between now and then as rear admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. Some of the captains that are going on are 59 years of age now. There is one who is going on in the next day or two, and he is past 59. What is the result? He will serve less than three years in the grade of rear admiral. He does not become competent and efficient as a rear admiral. He does not have time to learn his business.

Take it in the English Navy, if you please. The admiral of the fleet, Sir John Jellicoe, will have served 16 or 20 years in the grade of admiral—I do not remember just exactly how long. He learns his business. He knows how to handle the fleet. He knows how to handle men and discharge the duties and functions of the grade of admiral. What have we been doing? We have been putting admirals on at 59, 60, and 61 years of age, and they would stay on one or two years and then go on the retired list before they had learned their business.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does this personnel provision eliminate the promotion of an officer who is eligible for retirement in the next higher grade, or does it retire him in the grade in which he leaves?

Mr. PADGETT. In the grade in which he leaves.

Mr. HOWARD. Under that provision, when a captain came up for retirement, he was retired as rear admiral. That is the old law?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is the old law.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood the chairman to say a few moments ago to me that some 11 or 12 captains would be promoted to admirals between now and 1920.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I believe it is 19 vacancies between now and then.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not true that 65 captains will be on the list in the line at 56 years of age on June 30, 1920?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. I have a statement here that I read from the Judge Advocate General. He says:

On June 30, 1920, there will be two additional retirements which will cause promotions and leave the available list in the respective grades June 30, 1920: Captains, 49; commanders, 62; lieutenant commanders, 89.

Mr. BRITTEN. According to the Navy Register there will be 65 on the list at that time.

Mr. PADGETT. This is the official statement. It is from the Judge Advocate General, who knows. Now, in that connection, by increasing the retirement age of admirals from 62 to 64, they stop the line of promotion somewhat; but by the increase that is given in the personnel, there will be 3 admirals added. We have 18 now. Under the provisions of this law there will be 21. That gives an increase of 3; so you see the justice and the propriety of making this increase in age at this time. The increase of two years in the age of retirement balances the increase in number of three, keeping the men in two years longer, holding them from going out and somebody taking their place, but the increase of three in number balances that.

If you were to postpone that and fill up all these increases, then there would be no opportunity for this balancing and the equity to the Government. We put it in here at this time, and I want to state that, in my judgment and in the judgment of many of the naval officers who have expressed themselves to me, it is the greatest thing that has ever been done for the Navy—for its efficiency and its value.

Now, what is our condition, gentlemen? As I said, these young men get on this stairway at Annapolis, and all they have to do is to stand in line. It lifts itself up, and finally, with the onward movement of the endless chain, they are retired as rear admirals. We have had five or six rear admirals retired this year and five or six captains who have gone into the rear admiral list at $6,000 a year each. We are stopping that. Now, it is very natural that the captains should kick. Every one of them knows that if this legislation is defeated every one of them will ultimately become a rear admiral and retire at $6,000 a year. If this legislation goes into effect some of them will not retire as rear admirals, but every one of them will have four opportunities to be selected as a rear admiral, and if he has the stuff in him to justify his selection—and he is selected—he will become a rear admiral and will serve two years longer.

The gentleman spoke of the 56 years. We put that provision in there because every Secretary of the Navy since I have been on the committee for 12 years has been urging that our captains should become rear admirals at 55 years of age. They ought to have some time to serve.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to say a moment ago that these men when they graduated from Annapolis got on to the rungs of a ladder connected with an endless chain.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And that they went along with the endless chain, from one rank to another, without regard to their qualifications?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is, seniority.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, just wait. Is it necessary for a man to pass an examination when he goes from one grade to another to prove his qualifications?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then how does he get on an endless chain?

Mr. PADGETT. If a man can pass his examination——

Mr. MADDEN. Does not that prove his qualifications?

Mr. PADGETT. It proves a minimum of qualifications. It proves just enough to pass the examination.

Mr. MADDEN. If any business concern in America was to adopt the policy proposed by this committee—to retire men when they get to an age of ripe experience—every concern in the country would go into bankruptcy, and the Navy ought not to be treated in the way this committee recommends. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. I just simply want to say that practically every nation in the world has an age retirement in the grade, except the United States. These other nations are not all fools.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. PADGETT. England fixes the age of retirement below 56, and the other nations fix it below.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the existing law, when officers are promoted from one grade to another grade they must pass a physical examination and a professional examination?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, will the gentleman just tell this House how many officers have failed on these examinations in the last 10 years?

Mr. PADGETT. Very few of them.

Mr. BUTLER. We can count them on the fingers of one hand, can we not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. That shows the necessity for the legislation that has been reported here.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Now, suppose you did not have the 56-year limit for retirement, and you had the selection, just see where you would be. You would come here and select a captain who is 54 years of age. He becomes a rear admiral, and he serves until he is 64. All that time the captains above him are going up, and you are keeping them captains, and after awhile you select another young captain to take the place of a rear admiral going out, and you leave the old stuff in, and it would not be more than a little while until you would have a list of captains who would not be able to handle a ship that we have in the Navy. What we want is young men, young blood in the Navy, and, as I have said, the different Secretaries have come before us year after year and have urged that we bring in some legislation that will make captains become rear admirals at 55 or 56 years of age. We have brought it in here, and I ask this House to stand by it. But let us have men selected. The other nations of the world select their commanders. They select their captains, they select their rear admirals and put them in charge of the fleet, and what are we going to do if we ever have to meet them? Are we going to meet them with the best that we have, or are we going to meet them with the run of the mine? That is the question. We are proposing to meet them with selections of the best that the American Navy may have, and not with the run of the mine that has gotten on down at Annapolis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advise the committee as to the number of additional rear admirals, captains, and other officers provided under the act? I notice that the rear admirals are increased from 18 to 30. I directed an inquiry at the beginning as to the additional cost by reason of providing these additional officers.

Mr. PADGETT. It would take until 1921 to get that number of rear admirals. We fixed the number at 18 in 1899 when the commission personnel was less than half of what it is to-day. We are increasing it now with all of our ships in this program, with all the enlisted men that are necessary, and yet we are only increasing the list of rear admirals from 18 to 30.

Mr. STAFFORD. What about the other officers below that of rear admiral?

Mr. PADGETT. We limited the increase in captains to 10 a year. That would be an increase from 70, which we have now, to 120 ultimately. That would be the ultimate number to which it could be increased. We have 112 commanders under the present law, which was established in 1899, and this would increase it to ultimately 209 commanders. We have 200 lieutenant commanders at the present time. This would ultimately increase them to 218. We have 350 lieutenants at the present time, and the ultimate increase would be 971. The junior lieutenants and ensigns combined at the present time number 1,187, and the ultimate increase would be 1,239.

Mr. STAFFORD. Above the grade of lieutenants you are virtually increasing the officers in the respective classes 100 per cent?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is what the increase will amount to when they arrive at the maximum strength in 1920.

Mr. PADGETT. We are increasing the rear admirals from 18 to 30, and that would be 66⅔ per cent; commanders from 112 to 209, and that would be nearly 100 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. And captains from 70 to 120, nearly 100 per cent; and lieutenant commanders from 200 to 418, which would be more than 100 per cent; and lieutenants nearly 200 per cent.

Mr. PADGETT. That is in the lower grade, to take care of the young men coming in from the increased graduation from Annapolis.

Mr. STAFFORD. When they have reached the maximum number what will be the total increased pay?

Mr. PADGETT. That has not been reckoned up.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will be several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will reach a half a million.

Mr. PADGETT. I suppose it would.

Mr. STAFFORD. And may reach a million.

Mr. PADGETT. No; I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman made any computation at all in reference to it?

Mr. PADGETT. No; because we are proposing to increase the number of officers from 2,084, which we have, to 2,988. It will take until the graduating class of 1921 to reach that number, and that is the ultimate number that is fixed.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are making an increase of only 900, and yet you are providing over 100 per cent in higher ranks, at the expense of a half a million, or it may be a million dollars.

Mr. PADGETT. From 2,024 to 2,988 or 904 increase. But that is distributed over the five years, and it is even then not what it is estimated we will need when all the building program is completed.

Now we have to provide officers. Why should we go ahead increasing the building program, adding battleships, battle cruisers, and submarines and not have officers. Why should we add to our enlisted personnel and not have the officers. Gentlemen, we have to meet this question and now is the time to meet it, because we are dealing with the question, we are dealing with it to make this distribution according to this plan that has been adopted, and practically all the navies of the world except the United States have adopted it. Now is the time to make it before we have to undo what we have done later on.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman one question. I notice you create a rear admiral in the Medical Corps and also provide for rear admirals in the pay directors' branch of the Navy. I would like to have the gentleman explain that. As I understand it, the men who really sunk Cervera's fleet were the captains, like Bob Evans and Clarke. What I want to know is whether if this law goes into effect the men in the Medical Corps and the Pay Directors' Corps will draw more salary and be entitled to higher rank than captains like Evans and Clarke.

Mr. PADGETT. They do not have the command, they have the rank and title. We take young men out of Annapolis, men that graduate at the top, and put them in the Construction Corps. These young men would now have the highest rank that exists, which is captain, and the highest pay is that of captain. We did not think that it was right with these two services to take the very best talent, the very best young men that go through Annapolis, put them into that corps, and close the door against them and give them no opportunity whatever for promotion. There ought to be some incentive, and where is there more important talent needed, where is there a greater demand for ability and genius than there is to-day in the building of battleships that cost us seventeen and a half million dollars each, and of battle cruisers that cost us twenty and a half million each?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is in the Construction Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. I said in the Construction Corps.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am speaking of the Medical Corps, and the Pay Directors' Corps, and I can not agree with the gentleman that a man in an office here in Washington or Annapolis ought to have the same rank and pay as the captain of a battleship who goes out and defends our flag on the high seas. That is my position.

Mr. PADGETT. We have the line, which is the fighting part of the ship. We have the Staff Corps, and, for instance, the Medical Corps is in the Staff Corps, the Pay Corps is in the Staff Corps, the engineers are in the Staff Corps, and the constructors are in the Staff Corps. The highest rank that any of them have, as I said by illustration, was a captain. It was not right to close the doors to them. Other navies recognize the ability and give the rank to these men, and we thought it was right, and we gave it to them. Take the Medical Corps. The Senate amendment provided for 10 rear admirals. We cut that down to three. I think we were reasonable; we were not extravagant, and the conference report gives the Medical Corps three admirals, and it will take them four years to get the three.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. If this legislation had been offered upon the floor, would it not have been subject to a point of order?

Mr. PADGETT. It would, in the House.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, does the gentleman think it fair that legislation of this importance, that can not now be debated fully, that would have been subject to a point of order then, ought, on a conference report, which is expected to be disposed of by us in a few hours, to be adopted? The gentleman says this is very important legislation, and he states many forceful reasons why it should be adopted, but ought it to be done in a conference report and passed in this way?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; simply because——

Mr. BURNETT. One minute more. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] said that the chairman, when the question of the personnel came up, waived it off for some more convenient season. If that was right, then, why would it not have been fair to the House and to the country, nay, fairer, to have brought in a bill providing for these things without doing it in this indirect way, by getting it adopted as an amendment in the Senate and then agreed to in conference? It would have been subject to a point of order if it had been proposed in the House.

Mr. PADGET. There are many things that are subject to points of order that come in on appropriation bills, and this was put on as a Senate amendment and was not subject to a point of order. The question was put up to us of refusing to do anything or of meeting the responsibility that came to us by the Senate amendment and perfecting it and adopting legislation that is for the real good of the Navy.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee for some information in regard to amendment No. 239. The present law, and it is retained in this bill, provides that for each of the sums appropriated by the act no part shall be used to procure through purchase or contract any vessels, armament, articles, or material which the navy yards, gun factories, or other industrial plants operated by the Navy Department are equipped to supply, unless such Government plants are operated approximately at their full capacity at not less than one regular shift each working day.

Mr. PADGETT. That is left in the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Let me now read the exceptions—except when contract costs are less than costs in said Government plants and except when said Government plants are unable to complete the work in the time required, and except in cases of emergency.

The information I desire is why amendment No. 239 is placed in the bill, which amendment provides:

Provided, That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, the most rapid and economical construction of the battle cruisers authorized herein can be obtained thereby, he may contract for the construction of any or all of them upon the basis of actual cost, plus a reasonable profit to be determined by him.

Mr. PADGETT. That was put in for the reason that the shipbuilders and the Navy Department both stated that there had been no battle cruisers built in this country, that it was entirely a new venture, and they had no experience in building them. The shipbuilders said they did not know whether they would bid on them at all. The Navy Department said that they lacked experience, and they wanted this latitude of contract with reference to this new method of construction.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that if we continue to construct ships we will have experienced men in the employ of the Government, and they will be equally as capable of constructing battle cruisers as would the private enterprise that has had no experience.

Mr. PADGETT. Neither one has had any experience at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I want to read to the gentleman what the exception is.

Mr. PADGETT. But I have read it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. And under the circumstances which the gentleman recites, it would require that these be contracted for.

Mr. PADGETT. It says that he may do it. It does not require it. He is authorized to do it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It says except when the Government plants are unable to complete the work within the time required and in cases of emergency. It gives them plenty of opportunity to do this. The only difference is that one provides for a reasonable profit in the judgment of the Secretary, and the other provides that it shall be less than the cost of construction. That is the only difference that is made. If the Secretary sees fit, he can give it to a private contractor and allow him to make 10 or 20 or 30 per cent profit if he sees fit to have it done under private contract. It seems it is letting the cat out of the bag that these large expenditures that are necessarily made are for purposes of satisfying that invisible power that has brought forth this extravagance, unnecessary expenditure, and criminal waste of the public funds.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman to make a speech; I have not the time.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. In a moment. The effect of the amendment was simply this: With no ship of that kind ever built in this country, the Secretary is authorized to deal with those people upon the basis of the actual cost of the vessel plus a reasonable profit that may be determined instead of taking the chances of their bidding three or four times the profit that ought to be placed on the building for the uncertainty of the work. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the chairman of the committee recall when Admiral Winslow was before the committee, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] asked him some questions regarding personnel legislation, and the chairman of the committee interrupted and said that the full committee would later on take up completely new personnel legislation in detail?

Mr. PADGETT. I do very well, but the gentleman will remember that instead of concluding the hearings in the time we ordinarily expected they ran for three solid months and then we had to take up the construction of the bill and the handling of it here, and when we got through with the bill here in the House a number of the members of the committee came to me and said they were going home, that they were not going to take up any more committee work. In the meantime the Senate put on this amendment and the responsibility came to the conferees. They held a hearing; they have investigated it; they have put in a provision here that challenges the confidence and respect of the Members of the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman agrees that there were no extensive hearings given before the present Committee on Naval Affairs of the House?

Mr. PADGETT. Not before the full committee; before the subcommittee of conferees.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to call the attention of the chairman to the provision in amendment No. 89.

Mr. PADGETT. How much time have I remaining? I have promised some gentlemen some time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. On page 63, which embodies the personnel, in regard to the pay of rear admirals, by providing that the upper half of the rear admirals shall have more pay than the nine upper grades now receive——

Mr. PADGETT. That is just the present law.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the present law, but it applies to new conditions.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill contains, on page 70, some new law to the effect that hereafter all commissioned officers on the active list of the Navy will receive the same pay and allowances according to rank and length of service, and now those two provisions are contradictory.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read, will it not affect the pay and raise the pay of all the lower rank of rear admirals' pay fixed by law for the upper rank of rear admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all, because those are the rank each man gets by present law.

Mr. MONDELL. You create no new rank here of rear admiral?

Mr. PADGETT. There are two ranks of rear admirals, a lower nine and the upper nine, and the law fixes the pay of the lower nine and fixes the pay of the upper nine.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is quite certain the department will not construe that to mean that the pay of the lower rank is to be raised?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly; there is no doubt of that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks by publishing in the RECORD a short letter from the Navy League in connection with personnel legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

NAVY LEAGUE OBJECTS TO PERSONNEL ITEM—INDORSES BUILDING PROGRAM OF NEW BILL, BUT ARRAIGNS ADVANCEMENT SYSTEM.

The National Security League in New York last night made public a communication from J. Bernard Walker, chairman of the Navy committee of the league, and Henry Reuterdahl, of the United States Naval Institute, objecting to the personnel provision of the naval appropriation bill now in conference which provides that the promotion of officers by selection shall be finally determined by a civilian Secretary of the Navy.

In giving out the statement, the league takes the position that while it indorses heartily the big building program of the bill as it came from the Senate, and does not want to endanger the essential features of that program, which it approves, it believes the widest publicity should be given to the dangers of the personnel feature. The league believes that while promotion of officers by selection is highly desirable, such selection should be made by a board of naval officers, rather than be left with a secretary who might be biased by political considerations.

The statement says, in part:

"It is plainly evident that the bill does not represent the best thought of our Navy. It has not had the criticism of experienced naval officers. To pass such a bill, fathered by no one, and kept practically secret from the Navy itself is a rank injustice to the officers who are afloat and without a voice in Congress. The hearing before the House committee brought out the fact that the naval service had not asked for and did not want 70 or 80 more admirals, which includes the newfangled deputy surgeon general or deputy paymaster generals admirals all. Furthermore it has been brought out that there was a great diversity of opinion among the officers as to the selection feature.

"Promotion by seniority now in practice in the Navy violates every tenet of life and helps to kill the ambition of the younger officers, who have now no chance to reach even a lieutenant's rank before the age of 40.

"There are several features in the bill for placing civilians after a short service as engineers or aviators in the regular line of the Navy. These are all bad."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the gentleman has moved to concur in the conference report?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. That includes the proposition of change in personnel, officers of the personnel, but it does not include anything of the increase provided by the Senate in the number of capital ships?

Mr. PADGETT. No, or the number of enlisted men.

Mr. WINGO. Nor the number of enlisted men. As I understand the question of additional battleships and cruisers provided by the Senate is not included in the present motion to concur?

Mr. PADGETT. No; but the proposition of increasing the number of admirals, which is discussed——

Mr. WINGO. Is included in the conference report and agreement?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. That makes a slight increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I have very little time, and I have reserved some.

Mr. STAFFORD. For just one question.
Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman be quick?
Mr. STAFFORD. It is a very short question, and that is as to how the numbers in the respective grades of the personnel provided by the conference report compare with foreign navies?
Mr. PADGETT. Much less.
Mr. STAFFORD. The salaries paid in respective grades——
Mr. PADGETT. The salaries here in this country in every kind of labor and everything is on a much higher wage scale, and the numbers are very materially less than in other navies.
Mr. STAFFORD. In proportion to the number of enlisted men?
Mr. PADGETT. Yes.
Mr. STAFFORD. And the ships in those respective navies?
Mr. PADGETT. Now I promised to yield five minutes—how much time have I remaining?
The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.
Mr. PADGETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized for five minutes.
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. BURNETT. I desire to know if the hour will conclude the discussion of the conference report?
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know, but he assumes that at the end of the hour the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] will move the previous question, if he wants to do it, as he has the right to do.
Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came back from the Senate I called the attention of the chairman of the committee to certain amendments contained in it. One of those amendments to which I called his attention was amendment No. 107. I put this question to the chairman:

If the Senate refuses to yield on this proposition, will the gentleman return this bill to the House and give the House the chance to vote upon it?
Mr. PADGETT. I will.

That is amendment 107. The chairman of the committee made a square agreement, and it is set out in this RECORD, that before he would ever yield upon that amendment he would return it to the House and give the House a chance to vote upon it. And when the House conferees agreed to this amendment the chairman violated the agreement he made with me.
Mr. PADGETT. What amendment is that?
Mr. COX. Amendment numbered 107. I interrogated the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of this committee.
Mr. PADGETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have no recollection of it.
Mr. COX. I am speaking from the RECORD itself. I know nothing about these outside agreements except what the RECORD speaks. I interrogated the gentleman from Tennessee also upon amendment 89, the personnel amendment, and practically the same agreement was made by him with me at that time, that before ever the House conferees yielded upon amendment 89, the personnel amendment, the House conferees would return to this House and give us a chance to vote upon it; and yet the House conferees have yielded upon amendment 89.
Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. That is in disagreement.
Mr. COX. The personnel amendment?
Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no.
Mr. COX. Is that in disagreement?
Mr. PADGETT. No. We could not return that. We could not have a vote on it.
Mr. COX. I am speaking of amendment No. 89, I think it is. I said, when these conferees were appointed, that the history of it had been, ever since I had been a Member of this House, that the House conferees would yield when it came to the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," but on important matters, where the House should be given a chance to vote, the House would yield to the Senate amendments. Am I correct or am I wrong?
There were 250 amendments incorporated in this bill by the Senate. Of those 250 amendments the Senate conferees have yielded to the House in the case of 47, and the Senate has retained 124, with 79 of the Senate amendments still in dispute or agreed to by the House conferees with amendments.
I welcome the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. BRITTEN] in making an attack upon this personnel section. If I had it in my power, I would defeat this conference report, and if this House would do its duty it would defeat it. But all around me this morning the word is passed to the effect that we have to adjourn by 4 o'clock this afternoon and get away from here. Why? With a naval program of $315,000,000 piled upon the people of this country, we are told we have to get out of here this afternoon for some reason or other. We are not given a chance to debate and discuss these important amendments. It is considered more important to adjourn and go some place else than it is to remain here and discuss these important provisions.
Mr. Speaker, I called the attention of the House when this amendment came over here to the fact that it provided for 82 new rear admirals. I might have been wrong; I did not want to misquote anybody; but I was not very far wrong, because the House conferees' own report shows it provides for 67. Ah, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] hit the nail on the head this evening when he talked about this question not being investigated by the House Naval Affairs Committee. Why was it not? My experience has told me that this naval bunch of men always find the road of least resistance, and that road of least resistance, when they want to get something into a naval bill, is always in the Senate. It is not before the House Committee on Naval Affairs. [Applause.]
The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.
Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has five minutes remaining.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?
Mr. PADGETT. I have not the time.
Mr. OLIVER. I would like to have five minutes.
Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] may have his time extended 10 minutes without its being take out of the time already allowed.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] be extended 10 minutes without charging it up to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT.] Is there objection?
Mr. PADGETT. I hate to do so, Mr. Speaker, but I shall have to object. I have five minutes, and I will yield that to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].
Mr. MADDEN. We are dealing with a proposition of $315,000,000 here.
Mr. PADGETT. I understand; but we have debated it and gone through it.
Mr. MADDEN. Nobody has debated it except the gentleman himself.
Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] five minutes.
Mr. OLIVER. I would like to have five minutes.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after all, we are up against a practical legislative proposition. No one in this House ever has been wise enough to know all about all of the questions that he has to vote upon. There are a good many things in this conference report that I do not like. There were a good many things in the Senate amendments which I do not like. Some of them I dislike because of prejudice, which I admit to myself, knowing that as to some of them I do not have very accurate knowledge.
The bill with Senate amendments has gone to conference. I believe five conferees were appointed from the House—an unusual number, because of the various propositions of importance in the Senate amendments. I believe that five better men on this subject probably would never have been picked out of the House if five other men, whoever they might be, had been selected, and I doubt whether, if we send the bill back to conference with the present five conferees reappointed, or five new conferees appointed, the first would change the result, or the second would know anything about it.
I think the House conferees, on the whole, have done exceedingly well [applause], both on the personnel amendment and on other amendments made by the Senate. The personnel amendment now in conference is quite a different one from the Senate amendment. I very much doubt, if the House should consider the personnel legislation for a solid month, it would do as well as the House conferees have done in the present report. [Applause.]
I have been in Washington long enough to know something that does not require any one very long to find out, and that is that Washington is filled up full of naval and military officers willing to fight for their country and always willing to get a little for themselves on the side—legitimately—and that there are very few Members of Congress who do not know some of them. [Laughter.] I have heard gentleman after gentleman, during a service of 20 years on the floor of this House, tell what he knew about various things in the Army or Navy, when I knew he was retailing a conversation had with some interested naval or military officer. Now, that is not always the case. I do not think it has been the case to-day, but it is the case when we have a long time to consider measures.

To me there is only one thing for the House to do now. That is to agree to the conference report, and I think we on this side of the House are justified in doing that. Then, when the conference report is agreed to I think we will be justified in agreeing to the Senate amendments making the increase in the building program of the Navy, and increasing the enlisted force of the Navy. The conferees are practically carrying out in the main the program which the Republican side of the House fought for when the naval bill was before the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have forced the administration into line behind us for the protection of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 238, and agree to the same.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PADGETT. There is some debate wanted on that proposition.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the resolution is, but I am not willing to interrupt——

Mr. PADGETT. I suggest to the gentleman that it will not take a minute and a half, and may save a day.

Mr. MANN. It will probably take more than a minute and a half.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. And if you propose to interrupt the consideration of appropriation bills by requests of this kind as a regular thing, I will object all the time.

Mr. PADGETT. Can we not arrange to fix a time for a vote?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have had about eight gentlemen who desire time to oppose this motion to agree to the Senate amendment. I would say, however, that an hour in opposition to it would be all we would want.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Tennessee say?

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, that the debate on this amendment close in 1 hour and 20 minutes, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and I think 20 minutes will be enough for us.

Mr. BUTLER. Gentlemen on this side have voted for this conference report and have restrained themselves, but they desire a little opportunity to make speeches.

Mr. PADGETT. I did not know that there was anyone on that side who wanted time.

Mr. MANN. I take it that there are some other propositions involved.

Mr. PADGETT. If the House will agree to it, I will combine the consideration of the three amendments, and will ask that the vote be taken upon Senate amendment 80 and Senate amendment 83, immediately following the vote on 238.

Mr. BUTLER. Those amendments include the increases in ships and personnel?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that could be done and save time.

Mr. MANN. Why not consider those amendments along with this amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. I was just asking for that.

Mr. COX. Is it proposed to combine that with the increase of the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COX. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes to consider at the same time a motion to recede and concur in Senate amendment 238, and a motion to recede and concur in amendment 80, and a motion to recede and concur in Senate amendment 83. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. I object to voting upon them at the same time.

The SPEAKER. They are not to be voted on all at once. They are to be voted on seriatim. Of course there will be three votes. Does the gentleman object to that?

Mr. COX. I do not object, if I can get a separate vote on the increase of the Navy. I do not care what else they combine, but I want a separate vote on that. I do not care anything about the debate, so I get a separate vote on the increase of the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask that the debate on these three amendments close in two hours, one hour to be controlled by myself and one hour by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MANN. We will get some of the time, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay this vote. I am told by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] that we must get away from here at 4 o'clock. I myself can stay here until 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. This debate will run beyond 4 o'clock. The gentleman from Indiana does not always have accurate information. He usually does.

Mr. COX. I was told that by a Member on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent that the debate on these amendments close in two hours. That will be at 4.25 p. m.

Mr. MANN. That is, on the three amendments?

The SPEAKER. On all three of them; and that they then be voted on seriatim, voting on amendment 238 first, and then on 80, and then on 83. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. With the understanding that the chairman is going to yield time to us——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee is to have an hour and I am to have an hour.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. One hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] and the other by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Who is going to take the lead on this?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in which he appealed to that side of the House that they should support the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee, Mr. PADGETT, to concur in the Senate amendment of the building program, has merit in it so far as that side of the House is concerned [applause on the Republican side], for the reason that this is not only the building program that was contended for by that side of the House when the bill was originally reported, but it even goes it one better than the motion to recommit, made by the ranking minority member of that committee. There are eight capital ships provided for in the Senate amendment now to be concurred in, whereas the motion to recommit by the Republican members of the committee was for four dreadnaughts and three battle cruisers. I am not a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, as the House knows, but I have taken a good deal of interest in this matter from the very beginning. Whether or not there were dissensions on the Republican side of the House as to the building program, there were and still are dissensions on this side of the House as to what the building program should be.

Before this bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs Democrats on that committee, those who were not in favor even of the program submitted by the Navy Department—which, by the way, was for two battleships and two battle cruisers, making four ships in all—Democrats serving on the Naval Affairs Committee made an appeal to me as a peacemaker or an intermediary. I have not much reputation along that line, and yet they seem to think I have. These minority members of the majority wanted to bring in a report from the Naval Affairs Committee that could be signed by all the Democrats on the committee. That was a commendable spirit on the part of those gentlemen for party solidarity touching these appropriations.

At that crisis I was appealed to, being asked if I would go with one of these members of the majority to see the Secretary of the Navy, who is my close personal friend, and I did so. I went with these gentlemen in the effort to make a compromise by which the Democrats on the Naval Affairs Committee could bring in a unanimous report to this House. That was the whole purpose, and there is nothing in it that I am ashamed of. I went with Mr. HENSLEY, of Missouri, and spent an hour or more in conversation with the Secretary of the Navy. The result of the interview is contained in a letter addressed by myself the next morning to Mr. HENSLEY, which I will ask the Clerk to read in my time.

MAY 18, 1916.

Hon. WALTER L. HENSLEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HENSLEY: Following up our interview with the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, yesterday afternoon, at which time we both assured him that if the department's naval program could be modified by the elimination of the five-year building program, the substitution of two battle cruisers for the two dreadnaughts proposed, making a total of capital ships four battle cruisers, and attaching to the naval appropriation bill your resolution providing an appropriation for authorizing the President to call a meeting of the representatives of all the great powers at the close of the present European war with a view to reaching an agreement as to future armament, Mr. Daniels last night communicated with me over the telephone and asked me to say to you, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, that after consulting with the chairman of that committee he was ready to accept our proposition, and hoped that you and myself would use our best efforts to have a report on the naval bill signed by all the Democrats on that committee.

As you well know, this carries me further than I wanted to go, but I am agreeing to it and shall help you all I can, solely because of my great interest in the success of the Democratic Party, as well as believing that this is as small a program as can be put through.

Sincerely, yours,

Now, gentlemen, in corroboration of that statement of fact, on the next morning, May 18, the Naval Affairs Committee voted on a building program, and the patriotic gentlemen who are termed "small-navy men" on the committee not only stood to this agreement and signed the report but voted for five battle cruisers. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee stood on this floor and appealed to us as Democrats to support that report by the majority.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, when that bill was reported to this House, stood here and pleaded with us on this side of the House as Democrats to stand by this report of the majority of that committee and to vote down the motion to recommit that carried seven capital ships.

Mr. BUTLER. Eight.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Four battleships and three cruisers.

Mr. BUTLER. Six cruisers and two battleships.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am willing to let the statement made go in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. The minority report declared for eight capital ships.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am talking about the motion to recommit. We voted it down and stood by the majority report that was made to this House by that committee. We all stood by him, and every small-Navy man in this House voted for five battle cruisers and against the motion to recommit.

Now, we are confronted to-day with a motion by the chairman of that same committee to concur in a Senate amendment to provide for four battleships and four battle cruisers. Now, I want to keep the RECORD straight. That is the purpose I have in taking a few minutes that we might put a statement of facts in the RECORD as they are. You gentlemen on this side know that we are living in a time of change, when the kaleidoscope overnight brings about sudden changes, but the appeal by the chairman to Democrats in this House, and to Republicans for that matter, should show what has taken place since the 18th day of May, when that letter was written by me to my colleague following the interview with the Secretary of the Navy. What has taken place to justify the Democrats in doubling the program that they voted for at that time? The occurrences, so far as naval engagements and naval warfare are concerned on the other side of the world, if they are considered in a reasonable manner, would be to reduce the number of battleships for which we voted rather than to increase them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While we do not know it all, we know that the navies of a few of the foreign powers are very much less to-day than they were on the 18th day of May, when that bill was reported to this House. I may say that I am surprised that men will be swept off their feet by this hysteria for the expenditure of public money. I want to know if the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, or any man on the committee, is prepared to say to me that any shipyards in the United States can build capital ships.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says no. We are asked to vote money for the construction of eight capital battleships. There is not a man here, there is not a man in the Navy Department, there is not a man in the United States who knows anything but that knows that they can not be built within the life of the appropriation in the United States of America.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman mean Government yards or does he mean——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I mean all of the yards.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Can contracts be made?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Has the gentleman tried that out?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; we have.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. How many are now building in addition to those that are on the ways?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; we have; yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am glad the gentleman will assume that responsibility. He is the first man I have found who was willing to assume that responsibility, to make that affirmative statement. I do not believe it; and in the protection of the Public Treasury, for the consistency of Democrats, I do not believe that we should concur in this Senate amendment, and I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], because I know him so well and esteem him so highly that I know he will wish to be corrected. If the gentleman will again examine the motion to recommit he will find that the motion recites "on page 97 strike out the word 'five' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'six,' for cruisers," and the provision for two battleships.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me, being in a little doubt as to what the motion to recommit was, not more than an hour ago——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CONRY). The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] controls the time upon one side, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] upon the other. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] authority from the gentleman from Tennessee to yield any time?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Tennessee made the agreement that we should have 40 minutes upon this side, and it falls to my undesirable lot to apportion 40 minutes out among 40 men who each want to talk 10 minutes. I do not want to do it, but I shall do it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I want to give my authority. I did not examine the record, but I appealed to the colleague of the gentleman on the Naval Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS], and I asked him what the motion was, and he told me it was for four battleships and two battle cruisers.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, there is no one in the House who would think that the gentleman would try to mislead anyone.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Why, Mr. Speaker—— [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I must object to any more time coming out of that allotted to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, no wonder the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has fallen into the error of supposing we can build only five battleships simultaneously. The reason he has fallen into that error is because the Secretary of the Navy at the time before he changed his opinion, when he was fighting a large increase, on the 24th of December, 1915, gave a statement to the press, which appeared in the Washington Times of that date, in which the following occurs:

DEFENDS NEW PROGRAM.

Secretary Daniels also defended the $500,000,000 five-year building program submitted to Congress this year. This program, he said, not only would tax the capacity of American shipyards, but was "accepted as the limit of taxation the people would stand."

There are only five American shipyards equipped to build capital ships, Secretary Daniels said. These are the private yards of Cramps & Sons at Philadelphia, the New York Shipbuilding Co. at Camden, and the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., and the New York and Mare Island navy yards. These yards, he said, can build only one warship each in three years.

Mr. Speaker, I sent to the General Board of the Navy and found an absolutely different statement, which I put in the RECORD at the time. I think it showed clearly that you could build nine to eleven simultaneously. Then the Committee on Naval Affairs took the question up, and I think that it was reported to them that you could build even more simultaneously. I do this to show that the Secretary of the Navy has been fighting the Navy tooth and nail ever since this thing was started, until he found himself swept away by popular opinion. Two years ago in his annual report he said that we could not afford to build more than two capital ships. Last year he said the same thing, and he went on to say, "Wait until you see what lessons the war will teach." Last summer the General Board of the Navy reported in favor of eight capital ships—July 30, 1915—and he suppressed that report until it was forced out six months later. Then a little later on he sends in his recommendation for four, and he proceeds to defend it when it was attacked by saying that we can not build more than four. I am going to read to you from his address before the automobile engineers' banquet on January 5, of this very year. Bear in mind the fact that the address is made by the man who says that he has been backing a large Navy. We are told that it is not the Republican side which has forced the thing through, but the pretense is made that Daniels—God save the mark—is back of it. [Laughter on the Republican side.] We are told that the President, who only a year ago stood up here and said he was not going to get nervously excited, that there was no need of discussing this problem; we are told that he has done the trick. Are they back of it, or is it we, who have held them up and banged their heads against the wall until they have seen what public opinion is? Let me read to you what Mr. Daniels said on January 5, 1916, at the automobile engineers' banquet in New York:

The Navy program for new construction will tax the capacity of the shipbuilding yards, private and Government, and if Congress should order a larger program it could not be carried out in any reasonable time unless conditions were so critical as to cause private shipbuilding yards to quit work on merchant ships and concentrate on fighting ships.

Well, thank Heaven, we kicked his little program into the waste-paper basket, and we propose to build our big program in spite of his words of discouragement.

Here is a letter which Admiral Dewey wrote me at the very time when Secretary Daniels was telling the country that our shipbuilding yards could not handle a building program for this year of more than 5 capital ships:

OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY,
Washington, December 24, 1915.

Mr. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, requesting a reply to the following questions:

1. How many ways capable of being occupied by battleships and battle cruisers are now available in all our shipbuilding yards, public and private?

Including the building slips now occupied by vessels in the course of construction, the following are at present available capable of being occupied by battleships and battle cruisers:

New York Navy Yard	1
Mare Island Navy Yard	1
Cramp's Shipbuilding Co	2
Newport News Shipbuilding Co	2
New York Shipbuilding Co	2
Fore River Shipbuilding Co	2
Total	10

2. How many additional ways could be constructed, and how long would it take to construct them?

The shipbuilding industry of the country would be capable of expansion to meet almost any demand that might reasonably be made upon it. It would be impossible to state the total number of slips that could be made ready in a short time, but additional slips could at least be installed at the following places:

Union Iron Works, San Francisco; Maryland Steel Co.; New York Navy Yard; Philadelphia Navy Yard; Norfolk Navy Yard; Puget Sound (Bremerton) Navy Yard.

Sincerely, yours, GEORGE DEWEY.

Again he said:

With the adoption by Congress of the program recommended every resource of shipbuilding establishment will be packed to the fullest for their construction in a reasonable time. Is it wise to order larger constructions now when every well-informed man knows no larger program can be carried out unless the Government compels private yards to stop work on merchant ships and concentrate on naval craft?

That is the man who has been demanding a big Navy, is it? What do you think of that for encouragement to those of us who wanted a big Navy?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the building program as contained in this bill and as passed by the Senate providing for four dreadnaughts and four battle cruisers. During the closing week of May the House considered and passed the naval bill as it was reported from the House Committee on Naval Affairs with, of course, those amendments written in on the floor during the consideration of the measure. During the debates on the bill we heard the worth of the dreadnaught minimized and the opinion vouchsafed that as a class these ships were relegated to the scrap heap. On the floor of the House we heard expressions something like this: "One thing above all else the present war has demonstrated is that the efficient instrument for warfare is not the great massive battleship." At that very moment, Wednesday, May 31, when those words were being uttered on this floor, and other words very similar to those, the greatest battle fleets ever engaged were in combat off Jutland Bank, in what is known as the Battle of Skagerrack. This was the battle between the British and German battle fleets and was the first great battle in which dreadnaughts and battle cruisers were engaged, and the dreadnaught came off with first laurels in that engagement. Since June we have had an opportunity to examine the official report of the British Admiralty on that fight, and from this report we learn much as to the value of dreadnaughts. I trust most of you have looked over these reports.

The battle on that day was opened up by Admiral Beatty and his line of battle cruisers, and following him under command of Admiral Jellico was the dreadnaught fleet which came into action later on in the engagement. Before the main fleet came up Beatty's battle cruisers came into contact with the German dreadnaughts, with the result that three of his finest battle cruisers were lost before the dreadnaughts came up and engaged the German high seas fleet. The reports of this battle are most interesting, and on both sides it was demonstrated that the dreadnaught was the ship that would bear the brunt of the fight and also the ship that would give the most punishment. The battle cruiser has its place in the Navy, but the demonstration afforded by the battle off Jutland Bank shows that when these ships are matched against dreadnaughts they stand no show. It is most fortunate that this greatest of naval battles came at a time when Congress could take into account the lessons shown.

The bill passed this House originally with provisions for five battle cruisers but no dreadnaughts. Mr. BROWNING, of New Jersey, a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, made a motion on the Republican side to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report the bill forthwith so as to provide for two battleships and six battle cruisers. On this motion, 158 Republicans and 25 Democrats, making a total of 183, voted for this increase. The motion was defeated, however, by a vote of 189 to 183, with 170 Democrats, 18 Republicans, and 1 Socialist Member voting on that side. So it may be considered that the naval program presented to us to-day follows the steps of the Republicans of this House, rather than the Republicans following the steps of the Democrats, for it was we on this side who made the initial effort to pass a well-balanced naval bill.

This country has the longest vulnerable coast line of any nation on earth, and we have only to glance at the map of our country to have it plainly before us. We have in our active fleet on the Atlantic Ocean to-day 10 dreadnaughts and 6 predreadnaughts. These constitute the actual force of the Atlantic Fleet, 16 capital ships. On the Pacific coast we have no dreadnaughts or predreadnaughts except the old Oregon, which is no longer classed as a fighting force. We are building 6 dreadnaughts that are not as yet completed, and at present the dreadnaught North Dakota is out of commission on account of her engines, making a total of 17 ships of this class built or building, but with only 10 in commission. We have in addition to these dreadnaughts 13 predreadnaughts, or battleships of the second line, and 9 superannuated dreadnaughts, or battleships of the third line, and in addition the 2 old battleships of the Oregon class, namely, the Indiana and the Massachusetts. These are the only ships we can use to police and protect our great coast lines and outlying possessions. The predreadnaughts or older battleships can not be considered as fighting units, because the guns upon them are not of sufficient range and power to be effective against an enemy's dreadnaught, which could reach them with her guns before the older battleship even got within range to use her own guns. In other words, these older ships would meet the same fate as Beatty's battle cruisers did when they ran up against the German dreadnaughts. I have gone into detail at this point to show that we have only 11 ships of the dreadnaught class available for use to-day. Can anyone in the wildest fights of imagination claim that 11 ships, or even in addition the 6 that are building, are enough capital ships to protect both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Panama Canal, and our possessions in the Caribbean, to say nothing of the Philippines and Hawaii? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER or Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. In connection with the privilege given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to insert in the RECORD an article from the Evening Journal, of Wilmington, in its issue of August 11, 1916, relative to the ships in the United States Navy that have borne the name of Delaware. I also insert an article from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of July 2, 1916, being an article by Admiral Dewey, which appeared in the Sea Power Magazine, entitled "Lessons of Skagerrack":

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Evening Journal, Aug. 11, 1916.]

SHIP "DELAWARE" WAS PRIDE OF NAVY—TWO BOATS NAMED AFTER THIS STATE WERE LARGEST IN UNITED STATES FLEET—ONE BUILT NEARLY 100 YEARS AGO.

On two occasions within the past century Delaware has had the distinction of having named after the State the largest fighting boat in the United States Navy at that time. Six years ago, when the present dreadnaught Delaware was finished and anchored for a time in the Delaware River, opposite Wilmington, when thousands of Delawareans visited and inspected the mammoth boat, she was the largest ship in the Navy, although larger boats have been built since then.

Eighty-three years ago there was another Delaware that was the largest ship in the United States Navy at that time. This was the ship of the line Delaware. She was looked on as a mammoth boat at that time and the last word in fighting efficiency, although her length was only a little more than 200 feet. The comparison between the present Delaware and the old ship of the line Delaware would be something like comparing the ordinary excursion boat with one of the large ocean liners; yet she was the pride of the Navy in 1833.

Eighty-three years ago this month the Delaware was in the New York Harbor waiting to take Mr. Livingston, the new minister to France, to that country. She was the largest boat that had ever floated in the Hudson up until that time and attracted much comment throughout the States. The issue of the Delaware Gazette and American Watchman of August 16, 1833, published in Wilmington, being one of the old newspapers found by Dean E. Laurence Smith, of Delaware College, nailed inside of the colonial columns removed last week from in front of the college dormitory building, contains the following article on the ship of the line Delaware, which was reprinted from the New York Standard:

"There are now lying in the North River off the battery United States ship of the line Delaware, the sloop of war St. Louis, and the revenue cutter Alert, three beautiful models of the several classes to which they belong. The Delaware is the largest vessel that has ever floated in the Hudson, as she measures about 2,700 tons. Her extreme length is 210 feet and the breadth of beam is 52 feet; she mounts 92 guns and is pierced for 104. Her guns are distributed in the following manner: Lower gun deck, thirty-two 42's; upper gun deck, thirty-two long 36's; spar deck, twenty-eight 42-pound cannonades; when all shotted they contain 3,672 pounds of iron, or about one and three-quarter tons, so that her broadsides delivered 1,836 pounds. She is not taut rigged and has not the rakish appearance of the St. Louis, but her officers describe her as a fast sailer and pleasant sea boat. We were informed by one of them that on her passage from Norfolk to this port she was put about under treble-reefed topsails without even getting stern board on her. Some years ago the officers of the old Constitution used to boast of the gallant behavior of that ship in going about under double-reefed topsails. The ships that do this must work well and be well handled.

"On the spar deck is the captain's cabin, neatly, but plainly furnished. On the upper gun deck are the apartments for the wardroom officers, and astern of them those for Mr. Livingston, the minister to France, and his suite. On the lower gun deck is the mess room for the surgeons, mates, and passed midshipmen; below this is the cockpit, where younger midshipmen sling their hammocks—thus keeping apart the grave part, who is on the eve of promotion, and the skylarking youngster, who has scarcely been out banian day. The complement of seamen and marines will be about 900. They are divided into messes of 16 each, and seem to have every comfort provided for them. There are about 75 officers and petty officers, so that with the passengers there are about 1,000 souls on board.

"This is not the time to see such a vessel to advantage; the bustle necessary attendant on the preparations previous to sailing keep both officers and men constantly on duty, and the decks must in consequence be crowded most part of the time with provisions and stores, not to speak of the awkwardness of a crew just shipped and scarcely knowing their officers. Much has been done to bring her to that state that seamen call shipshape, and already her decks have attained a whiteness that astonishes the landman. "Holy stones and hand Bibles" have done their duty, and the few months necessary to bring the crew to that high state of discipline that our officers require, once over, she may, with pride, lay alongside of any ship of the line afloat. This class of vessels with us are universally rated 74s, although equal in force to the English 100-gun ships or the French three-deckers, since, though they carry fewer guns, the metal is heavier. The Delaware carries out several officers who, having seen much service, are now permitted to travel in Europe, thus improving themselves and becoming of more value to the company."

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, July 2, 1916.]

DREADNAUGHT'S VALUE PROVED, SAYS DEWEY—ADMIRAL POINTS LESSON TO UNITED STATES IN SKAGERRACK FIGHT—BIG BRITISH SHIPS HIT MANY TIMES BUT NOT SUNK.

The most titanic clash of sea forces in the history of the world took place off the mouth of the Skagerrack on May 31 between the German and British fleets. From a naval standpoint this is the most interesting event in the present generation. Its importance is not so much due to the results one way or another in advantage to the contestants as in the lessons it teaches with relation to the qualifications in actual contact of those elements that go to make up the modern fleet.

In the battle of Skagerrack great armored dreadnaughts came to grips for the first time in the history of the world. In that fight the battle cruiser played its part for the first time in a pitched engagement. Light cruisers were in the midst of the fighting and battled and died. Those daredevils of the sea, the destroyers, for the first time in history closed in on first-class ships in broad daylight to drive home their torpedoes and take their one chance in a hundred of surviving.

In fact, a modern first-class fleet with its various units went to grips with an enemy of its kind and tested its qualifications. All these fighting machines of the sea have heretofore been creations of theoretical but somewhat untried efficiency. The day of their test was May 31. The showings of that day will have much to do with the fleets of the future built by all the nations of the world.

Just what happened at Skagerrack is not yet clear, and conclusions drawn from that fight are made from incomplete evidence and may easily be upset. But two weeks after the fight it would seem that something like the following happened:

A SHORT-RANGE BATTLE.

The German fleet was feeling its way to sea, looking for an opportunity to strike a blow with conditions to its advantage. The British fleet was spread out over 300 miles of the North Sea. The day was hazy and a ship could not be made out for more than 6 miles.

This necessarily short range was to the liking of the Germans. Their fleet was concentrated. They determined to give battle.

Destroyers and trawlers make up the advance line that the British draw across the North Sea. Back of these are the fast cruisers. Still farther back and subject to call are the battleship squadrons.

The advance line reported the presence of the German fleet. The British were anxious for a decisive battle. The battle-cruiser squadron immediately closed in. It was nearer than the battleships and had 30 knots of speed against their 20, so it got into the fight first. Battle cruisers were not intended to fight battleships, and it was suspected that German dreadnaughts were ready for action. Admiral Beatty, however, determined to attempt to hold the German fleet until the British battleships could come up. He therefore went in with his battle cruisers.

It appears that three of his ships went to their death early in the fight because of this attempt. The Queen Mary, the Indefatigable, the Invincible, as dashing ships as ever put to sea, were sunk. It would seem, however, that they inflicted losses upon the enemy that made their sacrifice worth while. They evidently succeeded partially in their purpose. Some of the British dreadnaughts did get into the fight.

But the lesson is this: Battle cruisers, with the weight of their armor sacrificed to speed, with fewer big guns than have dreadnaughts, can not give and take with the latter class of ships. In grips with dreadnaughts they are pretty sure to be sunk. This has been the theory of naval experts all along, but that moot question of the point to which armor should be sacrificed to speed has never before had any actual experiments upon which to base its deductions.

The battle cruiser was crumpled up and its unfitness to play a leading rôle in naval dramas was demonstrated. The Queen Mary, a magnificent ship of her kind, displacing 25,000 tons, could not survive the big shells of the Germans.

DREADNAUGHTS IN ACTION.

This was the first phase of the battle. It seems to have been after the sinking of these three ships that the British battleship squadron, led by the Warspite, arrived. There were four ships in this squadron, and they immediately plunged into the midst of the fight. They appeared to have found a fleet that greatly outnumbered them. They unquestionably came in for a tremendous amount of hammering. Every vessel was struck many times. The Warspite and the Marlborough both suffered many serious hits. The Marlborough was torpedoed. Yet neither of these ships sunk, both found their way back to port, and both will soon be back in the service.

Capt. Phillpots, of the Warspite, tells a thrilling tale of the experience of his vessel and the punishment she took. His steering gear went wrong and his ship got out of control. She plunged into the midst of the enemy fleet. She drew the concentrated fire of six enemy battleships at one time. She ran amuck and sought to do all the execution possible. Her every gun worked to the maximum.

Yet she stood her punishment and came through. She served the purpose for which a big ship is created. She proved the fitness of herself and her class to perform the purpose for which dreadnaughts are built. She proved the correctness of the theory of those experts who have held that it is wise to sacrifice much possible speed for heavy armor and big guns.

The Warspite is a vessel readily comparable with our own Texas and New York. She has a similar displacement, 27,500 tons. She has eight 15-inch guns where the American ships have ten 14-inch guns. She is 4 knots faster than are the American ships and her endurance is probably less. What she did American dreadnaughts should be able to do.

The Marlborough is a 25,000-ton ship, of about the class of our Arkansas and Wyoming. She, too, stood a vast amount of punishment, including that of being torpedoed. This latter test of a modern battleship is very interesting. A number of fighting ships have been sunk in the present war by torpedoes, but they were mostly old vessels and without the resistance of the newer ships. The impression that a torpedo is sure to prove the undoing of the dreadnaughts has not yet been demonstrated and the survival of the Marlborough tends to disprove it.

DESTROYERS IN DAYLIGHT ATTACK.

A third and most interesting phase of the battle of Skagerrack was the attack of destroyers on both sides. These tiny ships, which were intended to serve the purpose of a screen, to be outriders and scouts of the big ships, had currently been regarded heretofore as being incapable of attacking first-class ships in the daytime. Their method of attack was set down as being one covered by darkness or by fog. Under these conditions destroyers are intended to creep in on the big ships, unleash their torpedoes, and attempt to escape before they are sunk.

It had been known that the Germans had practiced day attacks with their destroyers. This was a possible use of destroyers that neither American nor British fleets had given much consideration. In the North Sea battle, however, before darkness came on, the German destroyers descended upon the British fleet, got in close, and discharged their torpedoes. It is believed that near a dozen of them were sunk, and it is probably true that they did not succeed in destroying any British first-class ship. They unquestionably came near getting the Marlborough, however, and it is not shown that such an attack did not prove strategically advisable.

It is believed that the British fleet responded by sending its destroyers into the midst of the German fleet under similar circumstances. Certain it is that some were lost. The returns do not yet indicate what destruction these vessels created in the German fleet, and it is therefore not possible to draw conclusions as to whether their sacrifice should have been made.

The fact remains that destroyers played a very important part in the fighting and were active throughout the engagement. The usefulness of these small ships in a great struggle such as that which took place off Skagerrack is regarded as having been demonstrated.

A point of intense interest to the general public in this first big sea fight of modern navies is the high rate of loss of life aboard ships sunk. On the Queen Mary, the Indefatigable, and the Invincible there was hardly a man saved. Already the United States Navy Department is receiving great numbers of letters from individuals who have suggestions to make as to devices that might be used for saving lives aboard fighting ships. These individuals seem to draw the conclusion that no precaution is taken aboard a battleship for saving life in case the ship is sunk in battle. This is not true. When a battleship is stripped for action there is certainly no place on her deck for boats that might be used for life saving. She has aboard, however, pneumatic rafts, and every man has his pneumatic belt, which would keep him afloat.

ALL MEN FIGHT TO END.

In time of battle, however, there is no time and no inclination to make use of these devices. When a battleship is hit and seriously damaged there is no way of knowing whether or not she is about to sink. It may be possible that she will remain afloat for hours or that she may not sink at all. Her purpose is to continue to damage the enemy to the greatest possible extent. A single final shot from a sinking ship may be the blow that will turn the tide of battle and the destiny of empires.

A damaged battleship, therefore, continues to fight. The men remain in the firerooms, in the turrets, at their guns. Every man continues that particular job which is his in fighting the ship as long as she may strike a blow. It therefore happens that when the battleship goes down there is virtually nobody on deck and there is no man who may leave his post in time to put on a life belt or launch a raft. Quite naturally every man dies with the ship.

The theory of fighting the ship until the last moment seems to have been exemplified by virtually all those that were sunk in the recent battle.

The battle of Skagerrack seems to have justified the position which has long been taken by the experts of the General Board of the American Navy, a position which has met with the approval of most American authorities, and which has been crystallized into the program which America has followed. The General Board has recommended for 15 years that the United States continue the policy of placing its chief reliance in big ships. Since the dreadnaught came into being it has maintained that that vessel should be the backbone of the fleet. If appropriations were sufficient to provide but one class of ships, the General Board has insisted that they be dreadnaughts.

DREADNAUGHT IS SUPREME.

There is a constant tendency on the part of the public to go off at a tangent in its enthusiasm for the class of ship that at a given time is attracting wide attention. Last fall, for instance, the public clamored for many submarines and favored disregarding appropriations for dreadnaughts or battle cruisers. Later, the battle cruiser has been attracting much attention to itself because the incidental clashes of the present war have been battles between scout ships. So the clamor this spring has been very largely for battle cruisers.

The dreadnaught has attracted very little attention, because she has not heretofore been in the fighting. The public did not see that the very existence of British dreadnaughts in the North Sea resulted in the bottling up of all Germany. It did not generally realize that the battleship was performing its purpose without the necessity of fighting. The present clash, however, demonstrates that in the final issue it is the dreadnaught which means victory or defeat.

This battle seems also to have proven the value of that other branch of the fighting fleet which has been given most attention in the American Navy—the destroyer. The many opportunities for usefulness and the great possibilities of execution which rest with these little ships seem to have been demonstrated. The battle of Skagerrack seems to have shown that the United States has chosen wisely in selecting the units upon which she would depend in making a fleet from appropriations that made it impossible to have all the units desired.

The usefulness of the battle cruiser or the scout cruiser has not been disproven, but the inadvisability of depending upon fast lightly armored vessels in a clash in which dreadnaughts are engaged is shown. The cruiser is a necessity in any modern fleet unless that fleet is willing to grant certain advantages to its rivals which are provided with these fast ships. The theory that a time would come when they would displace dreadnaughts must, however, in the face of the new facts, be given over.

The battle of Skagerrack teaches less of the value of guns of various calibers than of most of the vital problems of the Navy. All the fighting was close in. The marksmanship was, therefore, not very exacting. The test on the guns was not great. Any gun and almost any gunner ought to be able to make hits at 6 miles. The advantage attributed to British guns and gunners had little opportunity to demonstrate itself. Likewise are the results in ships sunk by the British cruisers and dreadnaughts still unknown. The deadliness of the great British 15-inch gun can not yet be said to have been determined.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this measure I bear in mind past legislation on the subject. Take any period you wish from 1 to 20 years back and we have had an unbroken progressive increase in naval expenditures. Every year since I have been in Congress has seen millions of dollars added to the naval expenditure of the year before. Under Republican administrations it seemed to me something stupendous. Every year of Democratic administration the expenditure for the Navy has been larger, notwithstanding the claim by Republicans that our party was neglecting and handicapping the Navy. Last year we spent on the Army $100,000,000 and on the Navy $150,000,000 or $250,000,000 on Army and Navy. I am giving round figures, and in the figures I give I am speaking from memory. This year our Army bill as it passed the House called for $267,000,000 and our naval bill, as it comes back from the Senate and as we are called to vote on it here to-day, reaches $315,000,000, so that all together we have an Army and Navy expenditure for this year of $583,000,000. Why? Is there any cloud of war menacing our country? No; Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, we know that two of the greatest naval powers on earth have met in conflict on the seas, and during the last two years Germany has lost some 235,000 tons of the fighting ships she had at the beginning of the war and England some 275,000 tons. We see diminishing navies among the warring nations of Europe and increasing expenditures on our part to build a larger Navy than ever before. What is it for? Whence does it come?

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. HARDY. No; I regret I have not the time to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARDY. It does not come from a rational fear of war. We know that Germany is in the throes of a struggle for existence; that England is in the same condition; that every promise and prophesy is one of a yet long, weary, and exhausting continuance of the struggle. When that struggle shall end, as end it must in some far day, each of the contending nations embracing all the great nations of Europe will be exhausted and sick of slaughter and destruction. Those of us who are old enough to remember the return of our veterans of the war between the States know that those soldiers who came back, footsore and weary, did not want to seek a new enemy, and that the mothers and sons and daughters of the land, mourning their dead, prayed for no more war. But we are told now that we must believe that every great nation now at war, when peace in Europe is declared, will be anxious to find occasion to attack us and become embroiled in a new war with this great country of ours. They tell us this, notwithstanding we know that we have the friendship of Germany, that we have the friendship of France, that we have the friendship of England, and that millions of our people are brothers in blood of the peoples of those great countries. Every rational argument tends to convince every sober intelligence that if we but deal justly and fairly with them there will be and can be no occasion of war; yet the attempt is made by every possible method of agitation to terrify the public, and we are urged to build a larger and larger Navy. For what? A hundred years of peace with honor, a hundred years of war with no nation except war initiated by ourselves, the settlement of countless international disputes by friendly diplomacy, the negotiation of more than twenty treaties with great nations in the last few years for future arbitration and settlement of disputes, count for nothing with these agitators. The truth is, that like water wearing away the stone, the agitation and clamor of the jingoes like Roosevelt, of the militarists who believe that an occasional war is good for the world, of the big Navy people, the Navy Board, as you call it, of the Navy League, of the munition makers, of those seeking agrandizement and preferment or profits continually, like rising storms driving the waves into a fury, all this has undermined our common sense and judgment and drives us on to gigantic and fateful military preparations. It is not the Republican Party, nor the Democratic Party, nor the administration, that has made this bill. It is the hysteria whipped into fury and sustained by the propaganda of the militarists, the jingoes, and the self-interested munition makers of this country. [Applause.]

That is what is driving this Congress as it is being driven before the storm. That is what is driving Republicans and Democrats in the mad race for shelter in the biggest naval program ever adopted by any nation on earth, either in peace or in war. Gentlemen, for one, I believe that the interest of my country is not being served by the expenditure of $580,000,000 on the Army and Navy, to which you must add $125,000,000 for the Mexican border trouble and some $25,000,000 for fortifications. Put those items together and then pile your pensions upon it, pensions for the Spanish War and pensions for the Civil War, and interest on the war debts we have left over, and this great, peaceful country of ours will show in this year of grace a war expenditure of over a billion of dollars. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENDED REMARKS.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, Democratic estimates place the expenditures of this session at over a billion six hundred millions of dollars. Senator SIMMONS estimates it at $1,572,008,000. No possible system of taxation will raise enough revenue to support this program. What then? Why, we must and will resort to the blanket mortgage on posterity, to the sale of bonds, to support a system and spirit of militarism that has fed on the vanities and passions, the fears and greed, the brute instincts and ambition of rulers and of nations of every clime and every age? What is militarism? I will give you some of its meanings and some of its fruits. It means a nonproducing official artistocracy, raised by the people themselves above themselves. It means a tax upon the people to support a society which pays no taxes and produces nothing and is freed from all anxieties and worries incident to ordinary life, which, to quote the language of another, "is assured support throughout its entire existence, subject to no vicissitudes of success and failure that beset the path of the ordinary mortal—a caste that may retire from even the light duties of making reports or signing balance sheets at the age of 62 or 64 years, with salaries going on just the same, which salaries must be paid by those who have labored strenuously during a long life and who must still follow their trade until the working tools fall from the feeble hands of age."

It means throwing into our midst Army and Navy societies and auxiliary Army and Navy societies composed of wives and daughters to conduct a campaign of movies and theatricals to increase their numbers and powers, to fill the country with lurid pictures of captured American citizens, their inhabitants enslaved by imaginary buccaneers, of a giant beaten to death by a dwarf, a whale swallowed by a catfish.

It means a tendency toward the development of the arrogant side of humanity and the dwarfing of the manly independence of it. It means punishment in court-martial proceedings for minor offenses against haughty demeanor, so out of proportion to the importance of such offense that it shocks our sense of justice. It means what we have all learned very lately—that court-martial justice is generally excessive, and might be called barbarous in some instances. If a servant or employee in civil life resents abuse by master or employer with a blow, a civil court might, for the sake of upholding the peace and order of the community, impose a fine of $10 or a sentence of 10 days imprisonment. If a private soldier, exasperated by discourteous treatment that any true American ought to resent, resents with physical force, he is sent to the penitentiary for five years, and that five years very often, in its final result, is equivalent to a death sentence. This is the difference between civil justice and military justice. That is one of the reasons why the American people have a dread of military domination.

It means just what it has grown to mean in some of the old countries of the world—that the civilian has no right that the military is bound to respect. If a young officer with strutting mein shoves the civilian off the walk in one of these military-dominated countries, the latter dare not resent it manfully, because he knows the awful penalty of lèse-majesté.

There is no evading the truth that a mighty standing army, with the officials that command it, as a separate institution in this country, means the division of our citizenship into civil and military castes, just exactly what it has done in other countries. Americanism and militarism can not walk hand in hand.

The struggle against militarism is the struggle against war in the abstract, and not alone against war, it is the great struggle for human rights and human freedom. To escape militarism, to find these rights and this freedom, our fathers, in frail barks, crossed the ocean, leaving home and kindred, and settled here, and millions more are coming. So far in the history of our race no means have been found to put an end to war. The pessimist, the jingo, the militarist, and the war trafficker say no such means will ever be found. The so-called pacificists, and I am one of them, while no more in favor of the doctrine of nonresistance or peace at any price, with which they are charged, in the effort to discredit them, than the hottest militarist, yet hope to find the means.

They and the profound students of history base their hopes upon common sense, upon reason, and upon the very history of wars and of nations, and upon the eternal struggle for liberty, and for freedom from oppression of the many by the few, which is the struggle upward of civilization and of the human race. It is true that the present war is the greatest and most fearful in its horrors and atrocities of all wars, and there may be greater wars to follow. And yet we hope, and we know or believe we know, that more depends on the course of the United States in this epoch of the world's history than upon any other factor in determining when war shall cease, or how soon another war shall come, if come it must. He who believes that what has been always must be and will be, sees no hope for the future; but he who reads, and knows how many of the evils that for ages afflicted humanity have been banished, does hope. Time was when slavery existed in every nation, when the code duello and polygamy were practiced everywhere. Ancient history is full of petty wars between petty chieftians over stolen wives or stolen cattle. The greatest epic poem ever written describes such a war. The Middle Ages made every home a castle and every man a warrior and marauder. Religious wars had their day. Dynasties waged wars for glory and power. All these are things of the evil past. Higher education, nobler ethics, and the teachings of the Christian religion have swept them away. Trade wars and possibly racial-prejudice wars alone remain. The American Union of States points the way to the end of trade wars. We can scarcely imagine a war between two of our States. Surely all civilized nations can agree and will agree to some method of adjusting trade differences. If all Europe would agree to-morrow upon a just trade union between its States, just like that between that of our States, there would be no more wars between them. America's proud prosperity would be in danger of eclipse by the greater prosperity of Europe, and the prosperity of Europe would add to the prosperity of America. Such a union is not possible yet; but when the last ambitious autocrat is tumbled from his throne, when every government of Europe is of the people, by the people, and for the people, when the burning passions of this conflict have died down, when Slav and Teuton, Greek and Latin, Celt and Saxon, have intermarried, and the blood of all flows in the veins of their common descendants, when the melting pot of Europe has fused the traditions, the glories, the sorrows, the hopes, the happiness, and the prosperity of all into one common heritage, who shall say that war in Europe may not be no more? Another age, another day, must settle the race questions. Ours is the trade question. This century or the next will surely see the end of trade wars. God speed the day. And may our great Nation by its soberness, its forbearance, its patience, its justice, its peerless strength, and love of freedom, under God's providence, point and guide and lead the way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the United States seems not to have been able to maintain its poise and look at things as they really are.

We are going war mad. We are plunging our country headlong into immediate preparation for war. No one knows with whom or when it will be fought. We are piling up expenditures for the immediate future that are appalling. We are laying the foundation this year for larger expenditures next year. It is well on to three-quarters of a billion this year. What will the expense be in a year from now? I hope to God that war then will have ceased in Europe. Then I hope that the people of the United States will get their bearings and look at questions as they are. We should not lose our heads at this and at the other end of the Capitol now. The war in Europe is changing everything pertaining to warfare, but it is proposed by this conference report that we shall go on with the old-style program of battleship. Why not make an inspection of the wreck the war in Europe leaves and profit by it? This report proposes a battleship program which every man who knows anything about what has occurred in the last 10 years knows will be obsolete in a very short time. Within 10 years every battleship provided for in this program will be in the junk heap or obsolete. Within the few years I have been in Congress I have voted for the latest type of battleships, and they to-day are counted as obsolete and unfit for service. There has been no occasion for alarm at any time in that 14 years, and yet every time an appropriation bill that appropriated either for the Army or the Navy was under consideration we were said to be in imminent danger of war. The press of the country was teeming with forecasts of war from Asia, from Europe, dangers from every section of the world. But there was no danger.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I thank the gentleman. I refuse to be stampeded every time an appropriation bill that appropriates money for the maintenance of the Army or the Navy is before the House with the idea that we are in imminent danger of war. If we would cultivate a higher order of international statesmanship and study means for working out friendly relationships with all the world, in the conduct of our international affairs with the nations of the earth, we would need less of powder, less of giant battleships, less of army and naval organization.

The people of this country are for a reasonable degree of preparedness. They want to have a splendid organization in the Army and a splendid organization in the Navy, but in their sane moments the people are not imbued with the idea that this Nation must be put upon a war footing. There is no necessity for placing the country on a war footing to-day. No warlike situation arises from any direction; no threat from any Nation; no cause or justification for placing this Nation upon a war basis to-day, as is proposed by this program.

Where is the immediate danger that makes this great program necessary, that makes these enormous expenditures imperative? Why, as stated just now by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], every belligerent nation in the world to-day is exhausting its resources in men, in money, in everything that makes a nation powerful in war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee use some of his time now?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] is recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, love for the Republic and patriotic devotion to its highest interests should prompt all our actions here, especially in the matter of providing for adequate national defense.

Every Member of this House and of the Senate, every officer of the Government, State and Federal, and, indeed, every American everywhere, should love America as Macaulay says Pitt loved England, as an Athenian loved the "City of the Violet Crown," as a Roman loved the "City of Seven Hills."

This proud sentiment should be the patriotic motto of every Representative of the people into whose hands at any time is confided the safety of the Nation: He who saves his country saves all things, and all things saved will bless him; he who lets his country die lets all things die, and all things dying curse him.

Should the life of the Commonwealth ever be seriously threatened, this fervent prayer should ascend to heaven from every patriotic lip:

Great God, who rules the destinies of nations, that sees at once the fall of a sparrow and the flight of worlds, preserve forever to us, to our posterity, and to all mankind the country of Washington, the Republic of Jefferson, and the Union of Abraham Lincoln.

No cowardly impulse, no sectional selfishness, no narrow view of patriotism, no partisan prejudice, no sordid stinginess, should ever remotely influence our legislative conduct in providing for the common defense and promoting the general welfare of our country. Rather let us invoke the lofty and patriotic spirit of the Revolutionary fathers and of the saviors of the later Republic, who held no cost too heavy and no sacrifice too great when the sacred rights of humanity were to be proclaimed and the great cause of liberty and of union was to be defended and maintained.

The people of my district, like those of yours, my colleagues, are God-fearing and peace loving. They pray for peace perpetual with national honor unimpaired. But they are red-blooded Americans all, who love their country, believe in it, adore its flag, and are ready, if need be, to fight and die for both. They believe in both preparedness and peace—peace if possible with honor and national self-respect; preparedness as a guaranty of victory if war must come.

During the last 12 months my office has been flooded with letters from the people of my district. Thousands upon thousands have conveyed to me the double message of preparedness and peace. These letters are instructions from those whom I have the honor to represent to use my best endeavors to promote and maintain an honorable peace between America and all the other nations of the earth, but to neglect no act and leave no stone unturned to create a state of national preparedness that would enable the Republic to defend grandly and successfully its territory and its flag, if war should come. These instructions are sacredly binding upon me and by my vote and voice in Congress I have made it a point to obey them faithfully.

I am in favor of strong national preparedness, but I am opposed to militarism. I want my country to be and to remain forever the great advocate of peace among all the countries of the world. I want our glorious flag to represent forever the force and justice of democracy and military discipline, and not the tyranny and oppression of autocracy and military despotism.

The founders of the Republic designed it to be a perpetual asylum of liberty and of peace. They intended that the civil should remain forever above the military authority. They emphasized this design when they made the President of the Republic, a civilian officer, the head of both the Army and the Navy. I sincerely trust that their beneficent intentions will prevail to the end of time.

But the builders of our Government were not pacifists, "peace-at-any-price" men, who prefer humiliation to battle and the ease of a quiet and voluptuous existence to the fierce struggle of life in which courage and strength are born. They were men of blood and iron who preferred death and annihilation to dishonor and disgrace. They knew that the infant Republic had been created in the throes of revolution—in seven years and eight months of arduous toil and bitter struggle. Their vision was prophetic, and they foresaw that insurrection from within and invasion from without would necessitate military and naval preparedness if America was to remain united and free, and if the safety and dignity of the country were to be successfully defended and maintained.

No wonder then that Washington, in his fifth annual address, gave to his countrymen this sage advice:

> I can not recommend to your notice measures for the fulfillment of our duties to the rest of the world without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defense. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld if not absolutely lost by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.

No wonder that John Adams, in his second annual message, dealing with our relations with France, should have used this language:

> But in demonstrating by our conduct that we do not fear war in the necessary protection of our rights and honor, we should give no room to infer that we abandon the desire of peace. An efficient preparation for war can alone secure peace.

No wonder that Thomas Jefferson, in his fifth annual message, advocated—> the organization of 300,000 able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 26 for offense or defense at any time or at any place where they may be wanted.

It is interesting at this point to note that Thomas Jefferson advocated a larger Army for the defense of a small Republic of fewer than 20 States, populated by fewer than 5,000,000 people, than his degenerate Democratic descendants are willing to provide for the defense of a giant Republic of 48 States and several colonies, with a population of more than 100,000,000 people. It would be more interesting still if the virile, pugnacious, red-headed author of the Declaration of Independence, founder of the University of Virginia, and third President of the United States could appear again upon the earth and express himself after hearing the Democratic floor leader of this House [Mr. KITCHIN] cry "Hysteria!" "Hysteria!" when a justly alarmed people demand that their Representatives in Congress provide them with means of adequate national defense.

And, finally, no wonder that "Old Light Horse" Harry Lee, the petted child of the Revolution, the companion and confidant of the early Presidents, should have expressed himself upon the subject of national preparedness, as follows:

That Government is a murderer of its citizens which sends them to the field uninformed and untaught, where they are to meet men of the same age and strength mechanized by education and discipline for battle.

Those words are prophetic and pathetic when we think of the deplorable mobilization of the National Guard on the borders of Mexico to-day. The brave boys who compose the guard are comparatively "uninformed and untaught." They are without the necessary discipline, without physical training to endure the heat of a torrid climate, without the necessary equipment of a soldier in active service, and with food so small in quantity and so poor in quality that cries of protest and indignation reach us every day from the border through the columns of the public press. To send these brave boys into battle against veterans would be to murder them.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss very briefly national preparedness from three different points of view:

(1) Military and naval.
(2) Economic and industrial.
(3) Intellectual and spiritual.

The American people are woefully deficient in all these forms of preparedness. Our Army and our Navy are entirely too small for the proper defense of the country. Our economic and industrial life is prodigious and multiform, but unscientific and ineffective. Our intellectual and spiritual character is not of the first order of excellence and is decidedly unworthy of our national pretensions and aspirations.

There is absolutely no excuse for our present deplorable state of unpreparedness. We have now and have had for many years at our immediate command inexhaustible resources in men and matériel for the making of a great army and an invincible navy, for the creation of a thoroughly efficient industrial and economic system, and for the development of a magnificent intellectual and spiritual civilization. Our failure to realize hitherto all these essentials of lofty national life has been due to the indifference and lethargy of the people and to the neglect and incapacity of their statesmen.

The greatest obstacles in the way of adequate military and naval preparedness are the theories and objections of the pacifists, who are to be found both in and out of Congress. The convictions of these men should not be derided or denounced. Their aims are high, their motives are pure, and their impulses are generous and fine. Their hopes and aspirations for permanent and universal peace are honorable to human nature and are a splendid tribute to the higher and better qualities of the minds and hearts of men. But they are dangerous nevertheless, for they are nothing more than plain idealists and deluded dreamers. In making forecasts of the future they take no account of the past. The teachings of history mean nothing to them. The inherent savagery in man and the inevitable experiences of human life do not seem to impress them seriously. They refuse to ground their convictions in what men have done as the best assurance of what men may do, but insist on coloring their arguments with all the tints of the rainbow and on weaving them from the warp and woof of mere fancy and conjecture.

It is a ghastly and sickening thought, but if human history teaches anything, it is that man is a savage animal, and that recurring wars are as inevitable as the certain return of the tides of the sea.

In 1908, at Chicago, the late brilliant and gifted ex-Governor Black, of New York, nominated Mr. Roosevelt for the Presidency. The following is an extract from that perfectly polished gem of oratory:

The fate of nations is still decided by their wars. You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees; you may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life; you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women pray, but peace will come here to abide forever upon this earth only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.

This sentiment may seem pessimistic and be painfully disappointing and distressing, but the teaching is sound in the light of human history and experience, and we should never forget that the only safe guide for our footsteps upon the highway of the future is the light of the past.

A state of warfare seems to be the normal condition of human life and the bloody pastime of the nations. For thousands of years the peoples of the earth have been at each other's throats in terrific struggles. The gates of Janus, in Rome, were closed for short periods only three times in 700 years. Within the memory of men now living every important nation on the globe has fought two separate wars, and many of them three or four. Our own dear country is no exception to the rule. The brief span of the life of our Republic has been marked by five great conflicts—the War of the Revolution, the War of 1812 with England, the Mexican War, the Civil War, and the War with Spain. This does not take into account the Florida wars, the wars with the Barbary States, nor the various Indian wars that have marked the progress of our history.

For ages it has been the dream of philanthropy and the hope of religion that the perfection of Christian life and the advance of civilization would do away with all wars by illuminating the reason, softening the heart, and taming the savage qualities of men. But has this been realized? Let the terrible struggle in Europe answer.

The Sermon on the Mount is the chart of the soul on the sea of life, and its beatitudes are the glorification of the virtues of gentleness, mercy, love, and peace. Nearly 2,000 years have passed since the Prophet of Nazareth delivered this sublime and solemn message to mankind, and yet to-day the pathetic and appalling spectacle is presented of the Christian nations of Europe employing all the devilish ingenuity and the hellish methods that fertile brains and scientific aids can furnish to devise yet more fiendish means and to invent still greater guns to blow other Christian brains into seething froth.

No; let us not be deceived by the thought nor be beguiled by the hope that civilization as we now understand it will ever bring lasting peace. Experience has taught us that civilization at best is but a veneer, and that the slightest scratch will reveal beneath the surface the savage in the man. A pastoral commonwealth with justice and peace forever seated at the confines of the nation is a Utopian dream. Let the pacifists indulge their visions of a millennium of peace. But let practical patriotic men pay no attention to them. Let us not forget that the bitter experiences of our race teach us that wars are inevitable and that they come seemingly in obedience to a law as pitiless and inexorable as that which dooms us to the dust. Let us not forget that a solemn obligation rests upon us under our constitutional oaths as Congressmen to provide for the "common defense," as well as to promote the "general welfare." Let us then set about the task of preparedness intelligently and fearlessly.

MILITARY AND NAVAL PREPAREDNESS.

I believe that a Republic of 100,000,000 people, with several thousand miles of coast line to protect, with important insular possessions to defend, with the Panama Canal to fortify and guard, and with the Monroe doctrine to maintain, should have a standing Army of at least 250,000 men, with adequate militia and volunteer reserves, and with all the auxiliaries and equipments of modern warfare, together with a Navy at least second among the navies of the world. This belief represents my personal conviction and reflects, I am convinced, the sentiments and wishes of a very large majority of my constituents. This is my preparedness creed, and a brief summary of my votes in Congress will indicate my devotion to it.

I voted for the Kahn amendment to the Hay bill providing for a Regular Army of 220,000 men. This amendment was defeated. I then voted for the Hay bill under protest as insufficient, but as a short step in the right direction.

I voted for the Chamberlain or Senate amendment to the Hay bill providing for a Regular Army of 250,000 men. This amendment was rejected. I then voted for the conference report providing for approximately 206,000 men. This amendment was adopted.

I voted for the Roberts amendment to the naval appropriation bill appropriating $3,500,000 instead of $2,000,000, as originally proposed, for aviation purposes. This amendment was adopted.

I voted for the Roberts amendment to the naval appropriation bill providing for 50 instead of 20 submarines. This amendment was adopted.

I then voted for the Browning motion to recommit the naval appropriation bill with instructions to report the same back to the House with certain amendments that would have increased the appropriations for naval defense by $55,000,000. This motion was defeated by a very few votes. I then voted for the administration naval appropriation bill under protest as a short step in the right direction.

It affords me pleasure to be able to vote to-day for the Senate naval bill now before us. This measure is presented chiefly in the form of amendments to the House naval bill, which we have previously considered. These amendments provide for increases which are more in keeping with the national sentiment for preparedness. The Senate bill provides us with a three-year program looking to the construction of about 157 ships, of which 16 are capital ships, and of these 8 are to be built at once, or as soon as practicable. Of these 16 capital ships, 10 are to be first-class battleships, or dreadnaughts. The total appropriation is some $315,000,000—an important increase over the House appropriation.

I vote for the Senate naval bill with all the more pleasure, because of its provision for first-class battleships. Much talk and speculation have been indulged in as to the relative merits of submarines, battle cruisers, and dreadnaughts. Happily the battle of Jutland, or of Skagerrack, has vindicated the great opinion, long expressed, of our venerable admiral, George Dewey, that the dreadnaught is still and will remain always the backbone of any great and invincible navy. At the battle of Jutland battle cruisers, torpedo-boat destroyers, and submarines went to the bottom, but the dreadnaughts kept afloat, working havoc, until the finish of the fight.

The Democratic administration Army bill is a poor piece of military preparedness and does not meet public expectation or demands. On paper we have an Army of 178,000, but an actual Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, of about 110,000, and about 15,000 more in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. We must then rely upon the National Guard. This is virtually no military preparedness at all.

But little criticism can be made of the administration Senate naval bill. Its best recommendation is its bitter denunciation by the Democratic floor leader of the House [Mr. KITCHIN], who describes it as virtually a Republican measure.

It affords me peculiar pleasure to support this naval bill, because we have reasonable assurance that within three years at most our Navy will be second among the navies of the world. This is a consummation most devoutly to be wished, as a matter of national safety and as a reasonable guaranty of peace. A big strong navy is a nation's chief asset. It is our first line of defense, and we should make it impregnable and invincible. We have to-day made at least an important advance in the right direction.

WE CAN WELL AFFORD THE EXPENSE OF PREPAREDNESS.

The opponents of large increases in both the Army and the Navy for purposes of adequate national defense can not plead poverty in support of their contentions. The richest man on earth is a citizen of this Republic, and ours is the wealthiest among the nations.

Our annual products are valued at $40,000,000,000, estimated to be nearly one-third of all the products of the world and equal to those of England, Germany, and France combined.

The national wealth of the United States in 1912 was, in round numbers, $187,000,000,000, approximately $1,965 per capita. This is nearly double that of Great Britain and is more than the national wealth of France and Germany combined.

Our resources in men and money, in personnel and matériel, for the building of a fine Army and a great Navy are practically limitless, and there is no reasonable excuse, based upon the plea of poverty, for our failure to prepare the country for complete defense in case of war.

From the viewpoint of strict economy alone, complete preparedness is cheap, at the expenditure of even billions, when we consider the enormous expenses of war and the still greater burden of pensions following war—if the argument be valid that preparedness tends to promote and maintain peace. Better far to stand the expense of adequate preparedness than to foot the bills of war and its inevitable consequences.

But questions of grave import, in this connection, are now agitating the minds of the American people. Considering that we have spent so many millions of dollars upon the Army and the Navy, why are we so poorly prepared, they ask, from the military and naval viewpoint? Why is it that the great nations of Europe have spent so much less money proportionately than we have and still have finer armies and greater navies? Is the result unavoidable or is it the fault of our statesmanship?

It has been seriously charged many times upon the floor of this House that "pork-barrel," logrolling methods are employed, and that graft, corruption, and wasteful extravagance are involved in the expenditure of public money in the matter of Army and Navy appropriations. Indeed, the matter is becoming an important issue in this campaign. Only the other day, at St. Paul, Mr. Hughes, in speaking upon the subject, used this language:

> That is the kind of preparedness I believe in, which will make our appropriations for military purposes properly spent so that the public will get the benefit of the dollars it gives.

That is the point exactly, and is well expressed. The people are perfectly willing to be taxed to pay the cost of reasonable national preparedness, but they demand that strict accounting be made, and that 100 cents be shown in return for every dollar spent. It is right that this should be so. Indeed, it is nothing but common honesty in public service, and we may rest assured that the wrath of the people will be visited sooner or later upon those who violate elementary obligations in this regard.

It is true that the cost of living in America is higher than in most other countries. The cost of material is greater and we pay our laborers higher wages. But even these considerations do not explain the remarkable difference between the results of military and naval expenditures in America and those in Europe. This difference may be well illustrated by a few examples.

In 1881 we spent $38,000,000 on our Army, while Germany spent $91,000,000 on her army. Thirty years later we spent $122,000,000 on our Army and Germany spent $204,000,000 on her army. The result has been that, at the outbreak of the European war in 1914, Germany had a magnificently trained and equipped army of 5,000,000 men, while our Army in all branches of the service, Regular and Militia, numbered some 200,000 men, badly equipped and poorly trained.

During the same 30 years Germany increased her annual expenditures on her navy from $11,000,000 to $114,000,000, and we increased our annual naval appropriations from $13,000,000 to $120,000,000. A former Secretary of the Navy has recently declared that our Navy has cost $500,000,000 more than the German Navy, and still the American Navy is a poor second to the German navy. This showing is not merely astonishing, it is scandalous; and suspicion is growing fast among the people that Denmark is not the only State in which there is something rotten.

A further illustration may be found in the fact that Switzerland, during the past 10 years, has expended for military purposes the sum of $65,000,000, while we have expended for military purposes, exclusive of the Navy, during the same time the enormous sum of $1,300,000,000, or something like twenty times as much as our little sister Republic across the sea. The fact is made supremely impressive when we consider that our Regular Army numbers less than one-fifth of the half-million army of the "citizen soldiers" of Switzerland.

All these things suggest that something serious has been the matter not only with our previous plans of preparedness but with the methods employed in expending public moneys to carry them into execution. A crying need confronts us for a complete house ordering and house cleaning. A radical departure from old methods must be taken. Indeed, these methods must be not only revised but completely reversed if necessity demands. A remedy for the evil will undoubtedly be found in an enlightened program of military and naval construction, in which scientific experts will devise the plans, and honest financial administrators, guided at once by principles of high efficiency and rigid economy, will dispense public funds. When that time comes we will not pay, as we have done, $439 per ton for armor plate which, according to experts, can be manufactured for $230 a ton.

ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL PREPAREDNESS.

Military and naval preparedness means nothing, in terms of modern warfare, unless closely correlated with economic and industrial preparedness. Modern battles are not won by soldiers and sailors so much as by manufacturers of munitions. Proof of this is to be found in the fact that the munition workers of France and England constitute numerically a larger army than the army of British and French soldiers in the trenches of Europe. The man who manufactures a machine gun, a shrapnel shell, or a hand grenade is quite as much a warrior, in the modern sense, as the soldier who actually uses the gun, fires the shell, or hurls the hand grenade, for the latter is helpless without the former.

At a recent annual convention of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers the president said in his opening address:

> Military preparedness and industrial preparedness should go hand in hand. The sinews of war must be provided by the latter before the former can be developed to its full extent; and by commercial preparedness I mean not only the strengthening of those industries which would necessarily contribute supplies for a possible war, but all enterprise of manufacture, transportation, and distribution, so that we can put behind any body of men enlisted in the Nation's defense "a united, prosperous, contented, and determined population," and be able to supply all the varied wants of our people and furnish the fullest support to the Government in any time of trial.

This is a clear and concise statement of the meaning of industrial preparedness in its relation to military preparedness. It is, moreover, brimful of lofty, patriotic sentiment, such as should inspire and guide the merchants and manufacturers of our country in their endeavors to perform their full duty as citizens and patriots.

As woefully deficient as we are in military and naval preparedness, our condition is still decidedly worse in the matter of industrial preparedness. As proof of this please consider the following extract from an article on "Our industrial preparedness," in Leslie's Weekly, by Mr. Howard E. Coffin, chairman of the committee on industrial preparedness of the Naval Consulting Board:

A foreign officer in New York on purchasing business for his Government told me not long since that the results of the whole war had been very seriously influenced through the failure of American manufacturers to deliver rifles on contract time. * * *

One firm, which took a contract for a large number of rifles, worked for more than 12 months before turning out a single rifle that would pass inspection.

Another firm contracted to machine two hundred and fifty thousand 3-inch shells, the forgings being furnished, and the fuses to be set and the shells loaded elsewhere. This firm estimated that it could finish the job in eight months. At the end of 14 months it had delivered barely half the order. The contractors had no trouble with the lathe work, but were unable properly to heat-treat the machined forgings.

In another case 80,000 shell casings were rejected in one batch because an apparently insignificant variation in dimensions rendered them useless. It was a small matter, but one about which the manufacturer did not know.

Could anything be more distressing and humiliating, from the viewpoint of both pride and patriotism, than this flagrant exhibition of American ignorance and incompetence in the matter of munition manufacture? Is it not even more than a matter of pride and patriotism? Would not the liberty and life of the Republic themselves be in danger when committed to the care and protection of such ignorance and incompetence? Suppose that our Navy, the Republic's first line of defense, should be broken and penetrated by a foreign foe, and an army of 500,000 fully equipped and thoroughly disciplined soldiers landed upon our shores, what would be our chance of escape with such munition manufacturers in competition with the great gun works of Krupp and Creusot in Germany and in France?

But the worst has not yet been stated. As bad as our facilities for manufacturing war matériel admittedly are, they are better than nothing, and there would be imminent danger of losing nearly all our munition plants in case an enemy nation should succeed in overcoming our Navy and effecting even a slight invasion of our shores. In this connection, the following is from an editorial in the Manufacturers' Record, October 28, 1915:

Practically the entire production of munitions of war and facilities for building and docking warships are concentrated in a narrow strip of territory from Connecticut to Virginia. In this little strip, 200 or 300 miles in length and extending on an average probably considerably less than 100 miles into the interior from the coast, our gun-making plants, our armor-making plants, our shipbuilding concerns, our powder-making interests are all closely concentrated. It is conceivable that this limited area might at some time in the future be under control of an enemy, and if this should ever happen before these conditions have been changed the rest of the country, probably 95 per cent of its area, would be absolutely helpless, as it would be without arms or the facilities for making arms, building ships or equipping them if they were built.

All these things force upon us the distressing reflection that we would be totally unprepared if at any time in the near future war should be declared upon us by any great nation or combination of nations. If our Navy were destroyed, we would not have an army of disciplined men to resist successfully invasion. If we had the men, we would have adequate supplies of neither guns nor ammunition to enable them to fight winning battles. And what is worse than all, the few poor munition plants that we possess would soon fall into the hands of the enemy, leaving us absolutely helpless, except in the doubtful contingency of being able to secure guns and ammunition from abroad.

What we need, then, as the first elements of military preparedness, are more trained and disciplined men for the Army, more guns and ammunition in reserve, more and better munition plants, Government controlled, if need be, and located for the sake of safety along the Mississippi River, in the center of the continent.

Mr. Bryan proudly and boastfully declares that in case of invasion "a million men would leap to arms overnight," and Mr. Roosevelt humorously, but bitingly, retorts, "To whose arms would they leap?" Mr. Bryan is our great national political prose poet; Mr. Roosevelt is our great national man of action and affairs. During the Chautauqua season Mr. Bryan would be the more pleasing and entertaining. During times of war it would be safer to trust Mr. Roosevelt, for he would insist that we have in store an ample supply of arms to which to leap in case a million men overnight should decide to leap.

Considering the short life of a rifle in actual warfare experts tell us that at the very beginning of war there should be in stock, as an essential of national preparedness, five rifles for every man expected to be put in action. Germany is said to have had on hand at the beginning of the present European war 25,000,000 Krupp rifles of the most improved model. What we need is to keep constantly on hand 5,000,000 up-to-date rifles for a possible army of 1,000,000 men, composed of Regulars, militiamen, and volunteer reserves. A million men might spring up over night, but we have reason to believe that 1,000,000 guns of modern pattern would come very slowly from our American munition plants. We should have in stock several million rifles for emergency, in spite of the fact that many experts assure us that the machine gun and the hand grenade have sounded the rifle's doom.

In the matter of industrial preparedness in its relation to military preparedness an all-important element is the question of transportation. The coordination and correlation of the railways of a country with the military system is now regarded as a matter of supreme importance. Speed in military action was the first rule of Napoleonic warfare, and Europe was conquered by a subaltern from Corsica because he always arrived first on the ground and whipped the main body of the enemy before the reserves had time to arrive.

German efficiency in matters of military and industrial preparedness is world-famed, and in no respect is this efficiency more remarkable than in the marvelous development of her railway system with a view to military strategy and expedition. The ability to transport vast bodies of troops overnight from one frontier to another has enabled the Germans more than anything else to beat back from their territory during two years the allied forces of Europe, outnumbering them two to one.

It is the duty of the Congress, as a matter of industrial preparedness, to frame such legislation as will give us complete control of railway transportation for the movement of troops in times of war as emergency may at any time demand. The undoubted patriotism of the owners and managers of our roads would in all probability render unnecessary drastic Government action to secure such control, but the sovereignty of the people over private interests should be ready and prepared to assert itself legally and immediately if necessity arose.

INTELLECTUAL AND SPIRITUAL PREPAREDNESS.

I come now, in closing, to discuss intellectual and spiritual preparedness. This is a higher form than either military and naval or economic and industrial preparedness. It is as much higher as the spirit of man is greater and nobler than his body, and as pure reason is stronger than brute force. It has been truly said that—

Knowledge is power, especially military power; brains are better than bullets; intellect can be more deadly than either muscle or morals.

We have during this session doubled the Corps of Cadets at West Point and of midshipmen at Annapolis. The idea was to promote an important element of military and naval preparedness in the matter of furnishing well-educated officers to the Army and Navy. I am delighted beyond measure that we did this. I voted for both resolutions providing for the increase. I regarded them then and consider them now as measures designed to contribute to the intellectual and spiritual as well as to the military and naval preparedness of the Republic.

But I wish to be clearly understood. I do not mean that intellectual and spiritual preparedness should be confined to West Point and Annapolis, or to the ranks of the soldiers in the Army, or to the sailors upon our battleships that float the sea. I mean that such preparedness should extend through all classes of our people, from the humblest bricklayer who earns his modest living in lowly toil to the lofty-plumed chieftain who commands our armies in the hour of battle.

Nor do I mean that intellectual and spiritual preparedness should be limited to the discipline and training of men in military tactics alone. I mean that we should abandon forever our national mercenary tendencies and cultivate henceforth assiduously those beautiful arts and sciences that have been at once the glory and the ornament of the greatest civilizations of the earth.

The educated European has only contempt for our military and naval preparedness and derides unmercifully both the personnel and discipline of our Army and our Navy. But his criticism is still more fierce and cruel when he comes to deride and denounce our intellectual and spiritual life. In moments of poor tact and bad taste when he is irritated by what he is pleased to call American freshness and crudity of behavior he is heard to make substantially this speech:

You Americans are strangers to the fine arts and have no prestige of which you can boast. We Europeans are the keepers of the art treasures of the world. Ours is the Uffizi Gallery, the Dresden Gallery, the Louvre, the British Museum. Ours is the Sistine Madonna, the Transfiguration, the Venus de Milo, the Venus di Medici. If you have in America a masterpiece of sculpture or of painting, we may rest assured that no American executed the work of art. It was purchased with the dollars of Rockefeller or of Morgan. In short, you have produced no Appelles, no Phydias, no Canova, no Raphael.

You can boast no splendid triumphs in literature. Your literary greatness is as shallow and superficial as everything else American. The pages of your literary history reveal the name of no first-class genius—no Homer, no Dante, no Goethe, no Shakespeare.

In the sublime world of music you are still wanderers in a desert, without the name of one great creative master to your credit. The stage of the Metropolitan Opera House is crowded with the children of genius of strange lands. No Beethoven, no Wagner, no Bach, no Verdi, no Caruso was born in America.

No great religious triumph adorns the pages of your history. The Jew is the master builder of the great spiritual temple of the human race, whose corner stone is Hebrew prophecy and whose gorgeous domes are the claims of Jesus and Mohammed to the Messiahship of God. The Jew—an Asiatic, not an American—emerged from the plains of Mesopotamia in the twilight of history, and, from his Lilliputian kingdom in Palestine, sent forth a religion not only for the earth but for the universe.

You Americans are the Phœnicians, not the Athenians, of modern times—a nation of merchants, a republic of peddlers. Upon the altar of commercial greed you sacrifice the highest aims, and to the acquisition of wealth you prostitute the noblest purposes of life. To you a silver dollar is more beautiful than an epic poem or a Grecian statue, and the amassing of a fortune is grander than the discovery of a planet. You are worshipers of mammon and not of God.

This criticism of the educated foreigner is founded greatly in truth and in fact, and candid Americans will not deny it. My plea, then, in the matter of intellectual and spiritual preparedness, is for a republic of letters and of music, of religion and philosophy, of poetry and eloquence, of science and art, as well as of armies and navies, for these are the things that "exalteth a nation" and make it truly and sublimely great.

My further and final plea is for the establishment and maintenance of the rights and sovereignty of the plain citizen of this Republic and for the actual and absolute rule of the people under representative forms of government. My fervent prayer is that I may live to see the day when the Government of my country will be so generous and so just in its treatment of this plain citizen that ample opportunity will be his, as a matter of leisure and recreation from grinding toil, to acquire that noble culture, that genuine education that ennobles existence and contributes joy and dignity to life. My plea is for the passage of laws that make infamous and criminal the forcing of children to work in sweatshops when they should be attending public schools. My hope is that the day is not far distant when every child in the Republic, as a matter of intellectual and spiritual preparedness for the duties of good citizenship, will be forced by both State and Federal laws out of workshops into schoolrooms.

I am an advocate of the public-school system. I do not deride or condemn American universities like Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and Princeton. They are the jewels of our intellectual body, and God grant that there may be more of them as the years roll on. But the American university is not the great temple of intellectual and spiritual preparedness of the Republic. The great temple is the public-school building over which floats the Stars and Stripes, upon whose walls are the portraits of Washington and Lincoln, and in which the brown-skinned, barefoot boy may learn to read the Constitution of his country and the Bible of his God.

The public-school building is America's great melting pot of patriotism and good citizenship. In its march of thousands of years the human race has encircled the globe and entered this its last promised land, containing every condition of national greatness and human happiness. In the population of America are mingled the representatives of every race and every tribe of earth. This heterogeneous mass must be fashioned into a homogeneous whole in the public school by the public-school teacher. There the English language must be taught. There must be taught the great patriotic chapters of our history—the foundation of the Republic, the growth of our constitutional freedom, and the preservation of the Union, culminating in the sacrifice and martyrdom of Lincoln. There the souls of the young children, the future citizens of the Nation, must be filled with the spirit of the American Constitution and with the glory of the American constellation. There must be taught an undivided allegiance that knows no fatherland but America and admits no loyalty but supreme devotion to America's flag. There must be instilled that fine form of patriotic fervor, based upon national unity and undivided allegiance, which glories in the achievements of our past and believes implicitly in the limitless possibilities of our future. The result of all these things will be the beginning of an intellectual and spiritual preparedness without which all other forms of preparedness are but achievements and manifestations of vulgar pride and brute force.

A further and final consideration is that all forms of preparedness must be democratic to the core and broadbased upon the people's will. Our whole military system should be Swiss rather than Prussian, democratic rather than autocratic. The time has not yet come for compulsory service, for universal military training, but it will come before very long, and the whole manhood of the Republic will be the better for it. The system of universal service is correct and just in principle. What belongs to everybody should be protected by everybody. It is a mean and cruel discrimination to require or expect a few men to risk their lives, and sacrifice them if need be, in defense of others who are either too cowardly or too lazy to defend themselves.

A system of universal service would promote most powerfully the spirit of fraternity and genuine democracy in the Nation, by placing the sons of paupers and the sons of millionaires side by side in the ranks of the common defense. Class distinctions—so deadly to a democracy—would then be avoided or destroyed.

Universal military service would vastly improve the physical manhood of the country, and thus lay the foundation for greater national prosperity and more complete human happiness. It was Herbert Spencer, I believe, who said that the first condition of national prosperity was to be a nation of good animals. This is all the more true since it is a well-known fact that fine physical qualities tend to develop not only stronger minds but better morals. It should be the deliberate design then of both parents and the Government to give to the youth of the country, the future citizens and soldiers of the Republic, in their formative years, good physiques—healthy stomachs, big biceps, muscles, and strong lungs to send rich red blood seething and frothing to healthy brains. Universal military training would contribute most wonderfully toward the accomplishment of this most desirable result.

Again, a system of universal service would develop in the individual man faculties of mind, modes of thought, and habits of conduct that would be most beneficial to him in all the callings of civil life. Exactness, punctuality, and courage, which are born of military discipline, are quite as essential to success in civil as in military life.

And last, but not least, compulsory military service would bring home to every young man in the Nation a sense of personal responsibility for the safety and honor of his country, and would thus create in his mind and heart a fervent attachment to his country's flag and her highest interests. This sense of personal obligation would serve to accentuate the responsibility and dignity of the individual man, and would contribute immensely to the creation of a collective patriotism so necessary to the life of a free people. And we should never forget that if we would avoid militarism in a republic, the individual man, the plain citizen, and all his rights, privileges, hopes, and aspirations should be remembered and accommodated.

If the liberties of this Republic are ever seriously threatened, they will not be preserved by the Four Hundred, although there are among them many brave and patriotic men. These liberties will not be preserved by professional men—lawyers, doctors, preachers—although these professions have their full quota of courageous and patriotic citizens. Men in public life, many of them great and noble, will not alone preserve these threatened liberties. If the liberties of this Republic are ever seriously threatened, they will be preserved by the plain, blunt man who never held an office and would not hold one if you would give it to him, who works all day in the sweat of his brow for an honest livelihood and then returns at nightfall to his humble roof to ask the blessings of Almighty God upon those during the night for whom he has worked during the day. That man created this Republic, owns it to-day, and, if need be, at the bayonet's point will preserve and perpetuate it to generations yet unborn. That man, the plain citizen of the Republic, must be accommodated by Democrats and by Republicans who wish to win victories in the future in city, State, or Nation. That man, like an unbound Titan, will work destruction and damnation to the political fortunes of any statesman of the future who seriously seeks to disregard his rights and privileges.

Mr. Chairman, in declaring our state of unpreparedness deplorable and in criticizing severely our military methods, I have not intended to sound a discordant note or to proclaim a pessimistic message. I have intended only to give friendly and patriotic warning. I believe implicitly in my country and I love passionately its Constitution and its flag. I believe that our people are marching onward slowly but surely to a marvelous and magnificent destiny.

We are deplorably unprepared for war, but the resolution and martial spirit of our people are still vigorous and intact. Our military prowess is merely dormant; it is not dead. Unless they have degenerated completely from the qualities of their ancestors of the Revolution and of their fathers of the Civil War, the youth of America to-day have in them the finest qualities of the best soldiery of the world. The military annals of mankind reveal no finer discipline, no more splendid heroism, than were displayed on every battle field of the Revolution and the War between the States.

The soldiers of Washington were no craven spirits, no mercenary hirelings, imported from the shambles of Europe to do battle for filthy lucre at the bidding of tyrant kings. They were freemen, champions of human liberty, as brave and gallant warriors as ever breasted the flood of death. No ignorant, vulgar rebels they! The Revolutionary ranks were filled with accomplished scholars, with men who read the tragedies of Æschylus in Greek as easily as the tragedies of Shakespeare in English. Government, philosophy, and religion were themes of daily and familiar converse around colonial camp fires. The soldiers of the Revolution knew the richness of their blood. They traced their lineage along a noble line to Crecy, Poitiers, Malplaquet, and Ramillies. They read the military achievements of their race in the recovery of the holy sepulcher, in the battle at Hohenlinden, in the capture of Quebec. They felt no inability to multiply these brilliant deeds; and when the battle call was sounded by the bugle's stirring blast and the thrilling tones of the trumpet and the drum it was then that the heroes of Saratoga and Yorktown, of Brandywine and Valley Forge moved to the impetuous charge with the victors' exultant shout. It was then they stepped, "like bridegrooms to a marriage feast," into the jaws of death, and their soldier spirits joined in eternity that band of warrior souls that, in every age from the mountain pass of Thermopylæ to the battle plains of Cuba and of Mukden, have died for the liberties of their fellow men. Such was the character and such the conduct of the soldiers of Washington.

More than 50 years ago civil war broke upon the country. The most momentous struggle in history called to the field of battle the finest armies of the world. Men from the North and men from the South rushed to the dividing line in serried ranks, with martial step, and with hearts that beat like kettledrums; and whether dressed in blue or clad in gray, at Gettysburg and Antietam, at Cold Harbor and the Wilderness, they sent to generations yet unborn a message of perfect discipline and deathless valor.

These were the ancestors, remote and direct, of the generation of youths who to-day attend our schools and walk our streets. These youths need no inspiration to victory on the battle field other than the sublime examples of their soldier sires. But they do need military and naval preparedness, which they have not. They need guns and ammunition and military training, which they have not. If all these things be given them, and their country be then attacked or its flag insulted, the historian of the future, in describing the conflict that must follow, in recording victory and in paying noble tribute, will say: "American cavalry illustrated superbly the dashing chivalry of mankind; American infantry drove bayonets through columns that never before reeled to the shock of carnage; American artillery sent unanswered anthems to the god of battles."

Mr. Speaker, I have an abiding and an unbounded faith in the great destiny and in the undying glory of my country. I believe that the time is not far distant when we shall have complete military and naval, economic and industrial, intellectual and spiritual preparedness; when American genius and American influence will dominate the nations and overshadow the earth; when our Constitution and our Declaration of Independence will be the mold and model of free institutions among all the tribes of men; when the torch of freedom which was lit at the flame of the American Revolution will be a beacon light to the oppressed of all mankind; when our soldiers and our sailors will be feared and respected on every land and on every sea; when the drum beat of our country will be heard around the world; when freedom's flag will illumine all the skies; and, whether proceeding from the mouth of an ambassador or from the hot throats of Federal guns, the mandate of the great Republic will be heard and obeyed throughout the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] who has just taken his seat declares that there is no necessity for the United States of America to prepare, that there is nothing on the horizon anywhere which indicates aught but perpetual peace.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I used no such language.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, substantially that. The gentleman said in effect that the nations of the Old World are destroying one another, and that therefore the future holds no danger of war for us. The gentleman seems to be perfectly sure that we, a Nation with thousands of miles of coast line, with important insular possessions; a Nation vastly richer than any other that the world has ever seen, and yet the most defenseless of all the rich nations; that we need take no thought of the future, but may rest content in the assurance of peace. The gentleman talks exactly as the President of the United States talked in 1913, in a message to Congress, when he could see nothing in the future but peace, not only for the United States but peace for all the world. Listen to the President of the United States, then as great an optimist as is now the gentleman from Kansas. I quote from the message of President Wilson, read by him in this Chamber, to the Senate and House of Representatives, December 2, 1913:

* * * * * * *

The country, I am thankful to say, is at peace with all the world, and many happy manifestations multiply about us of a growing cordiality and sense of community of interest among the nations, foreshadowing an age of settled peace and good will. More and more readily each decade do the nations manifest their willingness to bind themselves by solemn treaty to the processes of peace, the processes of frankness and fair concession.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

If I mistake not, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] was present and applauded vociferously at that point. [Laughter.] "An age of settled peace and good will among the nations!" And yet this optimistic, baseless prophecy of the President of the United States was uttered from yonder rostrum in the presence of the whole civilized world only eight months before the cannon's opening roar in the bloodiest, ghastliest war in human history. How much more does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] know now about what is going to happen than the President of the United States knew in 1913, when with such solemnity—and you will never forget the manner of that utterance—he prophesied for all the world an era of settled peace?

We do not want—no patriotic American citizen wants—war here. But we do want to be adequately prepared if there should be dangerous aggression upon our rights. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we have adopted the partial report of the conference committee, in regard to which I shall speak later. We are now asked to concur in Senate amendments providing for large increase in the shipbuilding program above that heretofore adopted by the House, including 10 more dreadnaughts and a three-year building program.

These increases will add to the appropriations carried in the bill before us about $35,000,000, and will add to the obligations of the Government in the next three years $487,000,000 more.

We are therefore asked to add to a naval bill, already twice as large as the bill of last year, expenditures and obligations equal to half our total yearly national expenditures for all purposes.

Mr. Speaker, staggering as these figures are, the popular thing to do is to vote for this increase. Yet I venture the opinion that if we could search the hearts and consciences of all the men sitting here we would find that not a third of the membership of the House here present believe that this increased program is justified or justifiable. [Applause.] Yet the probability is it will carry by a large majority. The great metropolitan press of the country is for it. The great manufacturing industries of the country are for it. All of the organizations promoted by those who benefit by war and slaughter are for it, and as the result of all these influences many good people in the country have concluded that we can not go too fast or too far with armies and with navies, and this House will respond. Yet I prophesy that few who vote for the increase but will live to regret their vote and to apologize for it.

One very remarkable thing about all this is that we find those who in times past have been opposed to reasonable increases and appropriations for the maintenance of the Army and Navy are now most vociferous in demanding this unnecessary and unjustifiable increase. A year ago we authorized the building of two battleships, and not a hammer has been struck to start them on the way to construction. A few months ago the Secretary of the Navy told us it would be impossible to lay down and start half the number of capital ships provided for in this program. He has since expressed a different opinion, but the facts have not changed. They are what they were a year ago. If we were able in this country to lay down and build the ships proposed in this program, why in heaven's name have we not laid down the two great battleships which we authorized over a year ago?

I can not believe these demands for enormous increases are in response to any sane, sound, or reasonable sentiment for the proper upbuilding of the Military or Naval Establishment of the country. They are in response to a wild hysteria, which, I regret to say, has been promoted largely by those who would benefit by these useless and reckless and unnecessary expenditures, by those who would find profit in the slaughter that would follow a declaration of war. The war in Europe broke out and is now raging because the parliaments over there were led to believe that the way to prevent war was to build great navies.

We stand here in the presence of a situation that demonstrates that these great military establishments are the inevitable precursors of war; that they will breed and compel war. We stand in the presence of the most solemn and astonishing demonstration of that fact the world has ever known, and yet we propose to start on the same reckless expenditure that has resulted in the awful catastrophe on the other side of the water.

Gentlemen, we are the greatest Nation in the world, and in the future we must, as we have in the past, reasonably prepare to defend ourselves; but we shall be best defended if we save our people from the burdens of unnecessary military service and taxation. Far stronger than navies beyond our reasonable needs is the splendid force of our hundred million intelligent, patriotic people. [Applause.]

Less than two months ago the House voted down a proposition of increase much smaller and less expensive than the one now offered. The chairman of the Naval Committee implored all good Democrats to vote against it. Now he appears demanding that we approve this much larger increase in the name of the Secretary of the Navy and the administration.

Let us see just what it is that they want us to agree to. Beginning with an increase of 10 superdreadnaughts, to cost over $20,000,000 a piece, the increases in ships runs all down the line, and if we agree to them we shall have a naval bill of $313,384,389.24 for the current fiscal year and we shall authorize the Secretary of the Navy to incur contract obligations amounting to $487,000,000 more.

We have done a lot of talking in this country at one time or another about being a peaceful and nonmilitary people. A favorite theme of orators has been our freedom from the burden of military establishments. And yet, if we agree to this increase and pass this bill we shall have passed the largest naval appropriation bill in all history. It is more than $50,000,000 in excess of England's naval bill the year preceding the breaking out of the European war. It is nearly three times the naval expenditures of Germany the year before the breaking out of the war. In fact, it is several millions more than the naval expenditures of Germany, France, and Japan combined the year immediately preceding the breaking out of the European war.

Those who think we have not been spending much on our Navy heretofore should remember that the outlay for our Navy for the 10 years preceding the European war was over $1,331,000,000. This was almost four times the expenditure of Japan, more than three times the expenditure of Italy, and exceeded the expenditures of Germany for the same period by more than $300,000,000.

Now, at a time when the navies of the warring powers have been decreased hundreds of thousands of tons by destruction of ships, and when those nations are loading themselves with a debt which will render it utterly impossible for them to continue great programs after peace is declared, we have outlined a three-year program more ambitious and expensive than any ever proposed by any nation in the world's history. And yet, those of us who do not approve the last ship and the last dollar of this enormous expenditure are characterized as "pacifists," and our patriotism is questioned by the more extreme and hysterical of those who are clamoring for naval and Army expenditures.

What is the necessity or the excuse for a continuing program for three years? Why should we pledge the future and coming Congresses to the tune of $500,000,000? Will the new Congress have less patriotism and less wisdom than this Congress? Can not the next Congress provide for whatever may be necessary at that time? The fact is, the continuing program is purely political. The administration was criticized for not being sufficiently for "preparedness." Administration leaders finally came to the conclusion that preparedness was popular. They started out in cold blood to out Herod the most rampant preacher of preparedness, and the only way to make the thing look big enough to stop the mouth of the most blatant of the howlers was to have a three-year program and run the cost up to near a billion.

If there is any credit in it, the credit belongs to the Republicans, for they forced the hand of the administration. If you think this enormous program unwise, unjustifiable, and wicked, as I do, the blame is on the Democrats, for they control the administration and both Houses of Congress. Their Members vote as the administration wants them to. In the House a great many Republicans have from the first believed in a large naval program, some of them have believed in a very large program. On the Democratic side not a handful of men have, in their hearts, believed in or approved the programs now proposed, but they will vote for them just the same, because the President wants them to. As between men who will vote for a thing because they believe in it and those who vote for a thing because their party leaders tell them to, I have the greatest respect for those who vote their opinions, even though I may disagree with their views.

Now, just a word about the conference report. I do not think it is perfect—far from it—but I congratulate the House conferees on the good they have accomplished and what they still hope to accomplish. At one time and another we have heard a great deal about the propriety of following the views of the "experts"—meaning, in a case like this, the naval officers. While this bill was before the Senate the Secretary of the Navy sent down the provisions for the commissioned personnel, which had been drawn by the experts. My opinion is, it never was examined in the Senate, and when it reached the House it was discovered that the experts had taken care of themselves and their brother officers good and plenty. We have been struggling along with 18 rear admirals. The experts proposed legislation, which was adopted by the Senate, which would provide for somewhere between 68, as estimated by the House conferees, and 80, as estimated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]. The conferees, with cruel disregard for the feelings of the experts, cut the number of rear admirals down to an addition of 3 immediately, 3 in the near future, and a possibility of 30 in all when the Navy is recruited to the full strength allowed under the new law.

Since I have been in Congress various questionable things have been proposed at one time and another, but I do not recall any case that compares with this increase of officers proposed by the Navy Department in pure and unadulterated nerve. It is a proposal that ought to shame every man who approved it. A rear admiral costs the country from eight to ten thousand dollars a year, depending upon whether he belongs to the upper or lower grade, and the conferees, in trimming the rear admirals, have saved the country about $350,000 a year to begin with and ultimately twice that sum. Incidentally, of course, they have interfered with the ambitions of some people whose real interest in preparedness, so called, grew out of the hope that they or their relatives or friends would secure high rank and big pay at the expense of the taxpayers.

It would take altogether too long to enumerate or discuss all the utterly unworthy and the questionable propositions which have been advanced under the cover of preparedness, and some of which have gotten through. After having talked for years about abandoning unnecessary naval stations, we are now proposing to build them up and buy more. There is an item of a million in this bill, which I hope will ultimately go out, for the improvement of Charleston Navy Yard, where there is not water enough to afford good diving facilities for a flock of mudhens. In order to get preparedness, we have to accept a $20,000,000 expenditure for improvement of an Alabama river on the plea that we must manufacture more nitrates for gunpowder.

All these things I suppose must be expected, however, whenever national hysteria, rather than real sound judgment, controls in planning for the country's defenses. We certainly can not be accused of not having done enough in this Congress for preparedness. I figure the expenditures as follows:

Total appropriations for military purposes, 1917.

Army	$267, 596, 530. 10
Navy	313, 300, 095. 84
Fortifications	25, 748, 050. 00
Military Academy	1, 225, 043. 57
Deficiencies	27, 204, 068. 83
Deficiency estimates pending	6, 000, 000. 00
Total	641, 073, 788. 34

That is certainly a snug sum to be spent in one year of peace on the Army and Navy by people who call themselves nonmilitary and pride themselves on being free from military burdens. It is more than twice the military burden that any nation in Europe ever placed upon her people prior to the European war. It is more than the total receipts of our Government from all sources in the fiscal year 1915. Is it not about time we began to look at these matters without hysteria and with sober judgment?

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman who has just taken his seat asks why there was delay in the construction of battleships 43 and 44. I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Navy explaining the whole history of that, and I ask to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. KITCHIN. What was the reason for the delay?

Mr. PADGETT. It was in order to obtain the benefit of the lessons to be gathered from the European war.

Mr. BUTLER. My old friend and I know that that is not the reason; that is a new one. There were no ways to put them on. I want the House to understand that. The navy yards do not contain the ways on which these ships can be built.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, it is not the reason given by the Secretary of the Navy five or six months ago to the public press.

Mr. PADGETT. It is the same one that I put in the RECORD at the present session, a letter from the Secretary in conformity with this one.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did he not say in the public interview that this was a busy time and that we only had three yards and we had not appropriated enough money?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and he also stated in connection with that that they were getting up new designs for protection against torpedo attacks.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not see that in the interview.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. HARRISON]. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, August 15, 1916.

DEAR MR. PADGETT: I observe from time to time criticisms of the Navy Department with regard to alleged delay in the construction of battleships Nos. 43 and 44, a recently widely circulated statement being to the effect that I had unnecessarily delayed these vessels. The facts are matters of record, but it may be convenient at this time for me to state them briefly for the information of the chairmen of the committees.

At the time these vessels were authorized to be built, March 3, 1915, preliminary plans were completed in accordance with the military requirements prescribed by the General Board and they were in such condition that under ordinary course advertisement would have been issued for these vessels in about May, 1915, but within a few months after the beginning of the present European war, in August, 1914, there had been some striking instances of effective torpedo attack, indicating that the development of an efficient form of underwater protection against attack by mines and torpedoes was a vital necessity for capital ships. With a view to accomplishing this result comprehensive experiments had been initiated in the latter part of 1914. Although these were pushed from the first to the limit of the facilities available they were not nearly completed in March, 1915, and it was evident in the spring of 1915 that it would not be possible to determine the most desirable form of underwater protection for our battleships for some months to come.

Upon the urgent recommendation of the Chief Constructor, who is responsible for this feature in new vessels, it was determined not to advertise for the construction of these vessels until the experiments had progressed sufficiently to enable some reliable conclusions to be drawn from them. This involved a delay of about four months, the advertisement for these vessels being issued September 4, 1915. Recognizing the necessity for the avoidance of delay these advertisements were not issued when definite conclusions had been arrived at, but as soon as it seemed reasonably certain that about the time of opening the bids, 60 days after advertisement, it would be possible to determine satisfactory features of underwater protection, the experiments continuing meanwhile and being pushed as before to the limit of the facilities available.

In advertising these ships the specifications provided that the Government reserved the right to make changes in features of underwater protection any time within three months after the placing of the contract. When the bids for these vessels were opened on November 17, 1915, they were found unsatisfactory on two cardinal points. First, the bids were such that unless there were vital changes from previous methods it would be impracticable to contract for the construction of these ships within the limit of cost fixed by Congress. Second, all bidders declined to accept the department's stipulation in regard to changes in underwater construction without a material increase in the building period. The department had required this period to be 34 months, but no bidder bid without qualification for construction within this time, the only bid which proposed a definite time under the usual contract conditions of the department being for 40 months.

At the same time the bids for the construction of these vessels were opened estimates were obtained from the navy yards—New York, Mare Island, and Philadelphia—for their construction. All of these estimates were well within the limit of cost set by Congress, and under the law the department appeared to have the alternative of going back to Congress for further authority or ordering construction in the navy yards under the authority already contained in the bill. The department was aware that there would be some delay in laying the keels of these vessels, if assigned to navy yards, owing to the existing conditions with regard to new construction, organization, and facilities. After reaching a decision to construct one of these vessels at the New York Navy Yard, and the other at the Mare Island Navy Yard, the necessary steps were at once taken to meet the various conditions involved. Contracts for the structural material were placed at once; that is, in December, 1915. By doing this the department anticipated the very rapid and large subsequent raise in the cost of material, which meant not only a saving in time but a saving of nearly a million and a half dollars over the amount which this material would have cost at the prevailing market prices at the time when it would have been ordered by the navy yards if the usual procedure had been followed.

Recommendations were at once made to Congress for authorization for the employment of the necessary additional draftsmen and technical employees at the two navy yards and for authorization to expend a portion of the difference between the estimates and the limit of cost for the purpose of increasing the necessary yard facilities. The necessary authority from Congress, under both of these heads, was obtained in the latter part of February, 1916.

In the meantime the technical bureaus completed the development of the underwater protection, and provision was made for the utilization of electric propelling machinery, which the private contractors were unwilling to bid upon. This enabled the speed of the vessels to be increased by half a knot and much facilitated arrangements necessary for protection. As a result these vessels embody a form of underwater protection markedly superior to that of all previous vessels in the United States and, it is believed, in any foreign navy.

While the keels of these vessels have not yet been laid, this does not mean that nothing has been done or that their completion will be materially delayed. With the present methods of work a large proportion of the hull structure may be fabricated in advance of laying the keel, so that for a large ship the actual laying of the keel may be done at a time within a period of several months without effect upon the time of construction. Material has been ordered and is now being delivered. The keel of the U. S. S. California will be laid at the navy yard, Mare Island, as soon as sufficient material has been fabricated to warrant it—probably about the end of September. There has been unforeseen delay in the laying of the keel of the Tennessee at the navy yard, New York, due to the fact that it will be some months yet before the New Mexico can be launched. As previously stated, it had been planned to work shifts upon the New Mexico, beginning in the early spring, in order that she might be launched in September or October. Due to the unprecedented demand for labor in shipbuilding trades, which suddenly sprang up, it has not only been impracticable to procure sufficient skilled workmen to work shifts, but difficult and at times impracticable to obtain one full shift. The work, however, has been materially expedited, as from April 1 to August 1 there has been 6.6 per cent greater progress made on this vessel than upon one of its sister ships building by private contractors, and 11.2 per cent greater than on the other during the same time. Work upon the fabrication of the Tennessee material will proceed, however, as the material is delivered.

Heretofore delays in the final completion of capital ships have nearly always been ascribed to delays in machinery and armament. Contracts were placed in April for the armor for both of these vessels, and it will be ready well in advance of the time needed. Similarly, contracts were placed in May for the complete propelling machinery, in which case the work is now proceeding. The fact that the armor and machinery will be ready in good time will materially facilitate the rapidity of building the hulls.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. L. P. PADGETT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, there are two schools of preparedness, two policies, two general and well-defined positions in Congress, in the country, and even among naval and military men themselves. One is preparedness for defense against invasion. The other is preparedness to contest for world power and control of the seas. There is no middle ground; you must choose between these two positions.

I am in favor of full, adequate, and complete defense against invasion, and for every preparation, at whatever cost, necessary to this end. But I am opposed to a naval policy looking to world power in war. I am opposed to a naval policy looking to a contest for control of the seas, the great common highway of all the nations. I am opposed to a rival military policy for this Nation. I am opposed to any military policy for this Nation which will arouse distrust and apprehension against us, engender antagonism, animosity, and enmity toward us. I am opposed to any military policy for this Nation calling for vast expenditures of money and burdensome taxation to maintain a menace to our peace, inevitably leading to war, and ultimately jeopardizing our very national existence.

Military rivalry is the criminal folly of the nations. If we increase our Navy to-day, England will increase her warships to-morrow, and Germany will, in turn, increase her navy to meet England's increase, and France will increase her navy to meet Germany's increase, and then we must build again and again to keep pace with this mad rivalry in war.

The grounds we urge to-day for an increase of our Navy to equal other navies will be urged again and again. If our increase will make us stronger against them, then their increase will make them stronger against us. This increase of our Navy will not increase our relative strength against other navies. It will not make us stronger to resist them, until we have built to the limit of taxation and other nations have fallen in exhaustion.

I will quote from the evidence of Admiral C. E. Vreeland, a member of the General Naval Board, and given in response to questions by myself relative to the policy of naval increase, and found at pages 585 to 586 of the hearings of the House Committee on Naval Affairs of the second session of the Sixty-third Congress, admitting the inevitable result of military rivalry:

Mr. GRAY. I wish to inquire of the Admiral if it is not the policy of other Governments to increase their navies with all the other leading powers?

Admiral VREELAND. It is, sir.

Mr. GRAY. What would be the advantage to us or any other power if the navies were increased equally by all the nations of the world? Would there be any advantage to us or to any other power?

Admiral VREELAND. Not if you mean in the same ratio.

Mr. GRAY. Would not the same grounds exist after an increase for a further increase?

Admiral VREELAND. It would seem so.

Mr. GRAY. The only advantage that could be gained by an increase of the navies to any nation in the world would be a greater increase of one nation over another. Is it not a fact that there is a rivalry now between nations?

Admiral VREELAND. No, sir.

Mr. GRAY. They are all going up together?

Admiral VREELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAY. There would be no advantage gained by any nation, then. How long could that be maintained, that even increase, and what advantage would it be to any nation?

Admiral VREELAND. If it continues to increase, the poorer nation will eventually exhaust itself, and then the other nations, the United States included, will have a free hand—I mean be free to build in accordance with the changed conditions. I think it proper to add that rivalry, in the sense in which that word has been used here, does not really exist, nor do I think it is contemplated.

Mr. GRAY. Then it is only a question of the limit of taxation?

Admiral VREELAND. Yes, sir.

But if there can be a doubt as to the effect of such policy, I will further quote from the testimony of Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt before the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, in response to questions by myself on cross-examination relative to the requirement for second place of a naval power, and appearing at page 3441 of the hearing of this session (1st sess., 64th Cong.):

Mr. GRAY. What is the one potent factor that would decide that rivalry, that contest, that race—if both nations undertook to have a navy in second place, and each declared that their policy required second place—what is the one potent factor that would decide that contest and race?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. There is not any one potent factor.

Mr. GRAY. Would it not be simply a question of taxation?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No; that would be only one factor.

Mr. GRAY. Would it not be the one most potent factor?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No.

Mr. GRAY. If you had the money you could outbuild to second place?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. But you can not build ships with money only; you have got to have the will of the people to build them; you have got to have the material and the skill to build them with.

Mr. GRAY. We have the skill and we have the ambition and we have all those things. Now, if you put the money at the disposition of the Government, is not that the one potent factor that would decide that contest?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No; I think that is only one of the potent factors.

Mr. GRAY. Do you not think it is the largest factor?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I think not.

Mr. GRAY. What is the largest factor?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. A large factor in building a fleet is the raw materials.

Mr. GRAY. Well, we have the raw material.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. The skill of the people to build and the skill of the people to man and fight them.

Mr. GRAY. But we have the skill; these men have told us that we have the skill here; we have the most efficient personnel; we have the material; we have the best workmen in the world. Now, what else besides those things do you require?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. The other thing is the medium of exchange—money; purely a medium of exchange.

Mr. GRAY. How do you get money, except by taxation?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. By taxation, of course.

Mr. GRAY. So that is the one thing that would decide it? Do you think, if we should enter into that contest, that our people could be made to pay more taxes than the people of Germany?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I think if they understood the problem of defense they would.

Mr. GRAY. You think we would win?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Undoubtedly.

And when we have won this mad race in taxation, when straining to the utmost limit in taking taxes from their people, other nations have fallen behind, when we have excelled in the weight of tax burdens which our people can bear, when we have outrivaled other nations and built a Navy, the most powerful in the world, then will come a great equalizing factor to operate in human affairs and under the law of self-defense to defend the weak against the strong.

Then two nations will join their navies, and we must build against them both. Then three nations will unite, and we must build against three. Then all nations, following immutable law, will join and unite against us, and we must build against the world. Then we will read our history in the fall of Rome and the defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo. Then we will pay the penalty in blood and treasure and human life for transgression of the law of justifiable force and might, as every warring nation of the past has paid it. Then we will reap the harvest of a false military policy and defense by invasion, as Europe is to-day reaping it in death, desolation, and destruction.

An individual of superior strength can not control his fellow men by reason of his superior power over any one of them. No nation can dominate the world by reason of being stronger than the strongest. Whenever such power is asserted by an individual or a nation, naturally and instinctively the weaker or smaller will join and unite and their combined strength will destroy the would-be dominating power. And there is still another principle that will assert itself for relief against force and might. Without such union of the weaker powers, internal dissension, factions, and rival parties will arise to resist and rend asunder a dominating power and restore equilibrium among the nations with freedom to progress and advance in civilization and the natural course of social evolution.

Defense is the first law of nature, an incident to life itself. Defense is the first and highest duty incumbent upon men and nations. Defense, full, adequate, and complete defense, is the measure of human responsibility and upon which our national life, our free institution, and our liberties depend. Defense is the true principle of military preparedness. Defense without rivalry in the arts of bloodshed and warfare. Defense without contest for world power or control of the seas. Defense while assuring the world of our friendship and peaceful relations. Defense, full, adequate, and complete defense, while maintaining security and protection against invasion. Defense while holding ourselves acceptable and unprejudiced before the world and always ready and willing to lead the way to peace and final disarmament.

But while defense is the measure of our duties and responsibilities for protection, it is the limit to which nations may prepare in arms and armament. Thus far may nations go in force and might but no further.

While the past is crowded with the annals of conquest, subjugation, and triumphant might, defense is the one military position which a nation can assume and maintain before the world to-day.

Moral law is as immutable as nature or the orderly development of life, and our civilization has advanced until defense is left the one and only military policy which a nation can maintain without incurring the penalties of transgression.

The want of adequate defense may expose us to the danger of attack from one power, but preparedness beyond defense in violation of moral law will menace us from all nations and jeopardize our very existence.

But our policy must be more than outward show and claim of defense. It must be defense in act and deed and in all our preparation and accomplishments for war. It must be defense so clear, so open, so apparent and conclusive to the world that no nation can distrust our motive or mistake our object, purpose, or intent. We must build only for defense, provide only for defense, and look only to maintaining a policy consistent with defense. Then other nations can not justify the taxation of their people to increase their navies against us. Then we will not be compelled to build so great a Navy to defend ourselves against them. Then the navies of the world will stop at defense. Then the criminal folly of military rivalry will be at an end.

If Germany had prepared only for defense against invasion, Belgium would have never been violated and laid waste.

If France and England had prepared only for defense against invasion, then Germany could have never apprehended an invasion of her soil and begun a war to ward off an attack from them.

As an evasion, we are told that it is impossible to arm for defense without arming for aggressive warfare, and that no such line of demarcation can be drawn in military preparedness. There is a line of demarcation and distinction. Whenever we prepare to convoy and transport troops to a foreign land, whenever we build a Navy of itself, in mid-sea or on a foreign shore, sufficient to overcome a navy in home ports, that is aggression. But whenever we prepare a Navy not of itself alone equal to other nations, but in conjunction with mines along our coasts, our submarines for harbor protection, our sea fortifications, our aeroplanes, and our land forces, altogether greater than the naval power any other nation can send against us, that is defense. We do not need a greater Navy than others for defense.

Germany's navy is only equal to one-half that of England's navy and it is less than one-fourth the size and strength of the combined navies of the allies, yet no warship of the allies has ever invaded or bombarded the German coast. Thus, acting in defense, in conjunction with mines, submarines, fortifications, and land forces, the navy of Germany is able to ward off the attacks of vast and superior naval forces, equal in strength to more than four times that of her own, and so should this Nation prepare a Navy adequate for defense but not invasion.

In July, 1915, the General Naval Board, constituted of naval officers of high rank and technical ability, recommended a 10-year building program, specifying the number and types of fighting ships, together with accompanying auxiliary vessels, which should be built during each year of the period. In November, 1915, this program was modified and a five-year building program was presented instead. The three-year building program, coming from the Senate as amendment 238, is a modification of the 10-year program considered by the Navy Department and disapproved of and the five-year program considered by the House Committee on Naval Affairs and the House and, after a full hearing by the committee, rejected by the committee and by the House on roll call. The same objections upon which the Navy Department disapproved of the 10-year building program and upon which the House rejected the five-year building program apply with equal force to the three-year program, and is objectionable only in less degree.

In order to properly consider and judge of these programs recommended by naval officers as measures of defense against invasion or as policies of military rivalry and preparedness to battle for world power and control of the seas it is necessary to inquire as to the grounds upon which the same are urged, the viewpoint from which the programs are recommended, and the policy ultimately to be supported.

For this purpose I call your attention to the recommendation of the General Board of the Navy on pages 75 and 76 of the Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1915, where, among other statements in support of the five-year building program, the following appears:

The Navy of the United States should ultimately be equal to the most powerful maintained by any other nation of the world.

It should be gradually increased to this point by such a rate of development year by year as may be permitted by the facilities of the country, but the limit above defined should be attained not later than 1925.

A navy in firm control of the seas from the outbreak of war is the prime essential to the defense of a country situated as is the United States, bordering upon two great oceans.

A navy strong enough only to defend our coast from actual invasion will not suffice.

I also quote from Seven Seas for April, 1916, the official organ of the Navy Club, as representing the opinion and viewpoint of military men relative to the objects and the international policy to be supported by the preparedness program thus recommended:

On the contrary, the battleship must always remain the queen of the seas and must be the deciding factor in any naval engagement. Without it there can be no bombardment of the enemy's coast, no convoying of transports, nor any landing of an invading army on foreign soil.

This is not defense against invasion; this is military rivalry, looking to world power in war, to contests with the nations for control of the seas, the unmistakable effect and inevitable result of which will be to arouse distrust and apprehension, engender animosity, endanger our peace, and jeopardize our security by arraying other nations to join and unite in common cause against us.

I also quote again from Seven Seas, for April, 1916, page 13, further showing the viewpoint of many earnest naval officers, and from which these recommendations come and the permanent policy contemplated:

If a nation remained in profound peace during a century, it would be exposed, if overprosperous, to fall into a dreadful state of decadence. The dream of international agreements to maintain peace is a pure dream untainted by reality.

I further quote from the recommendations of the General Board of the Navy, on page 76, of the Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1915:

Our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrances of the United States in peace nor to enforce its policies in war.

This will subordinate diplomacy, vitiate arbitration, and the principle of world courts and international equity now far progressed and advanced, recall the 31 peace treaties now in force with all the leading nations of the world excepting one only, throw back the pendulum of civilization a century of time, restore the ultimatum and the arbiter of might in the conduct of negotiations among nations, and reestablish the settlement of international disputes on the basis of force and war.

Nations are but individuals moving collectively and acting from the same impulses and subject to the same government. If civil power is but "A pure dream, untainted by reality" to maintain peace, if "Human nature can not be changed," if there has been and can be no progress beyond force and might, then why not individuals go back to the settlement of disputes by physical encounters? Then why not individuals go back to vindication of their honor by dueling? Then why not individuals go back to insuring their safety among men by carrying weapons and full arms?

Our Army and Navy officers are brave, courageous, and resolute men. They are highly educated and most efficiently trained and have acquired great knowledge, skill, and ability in the lines of their special calling. While they lead our armies and direct our navies the country may rest in security from an invading foe. But, like other men especially educated, trained, and exclusively engaged, they are actuated from convictions and views not always in accord with the great body of people. By reason of their special training, and having to do only with the policy of force and might, exclusive of social and moral factors, they often fail to recognize changes incident to the growth of civilization and preclude the consideration and employment of agencies other than might in the conduct of government and international relations.

It was upon these most serious considerations, solemnly and unequivocally declared, that the founders of the Constitution in the separation of jurisdiction, the division of powers, and the vesting of authority for exercise provided that the military should be subordinate to the civil branch of the Government.

Other and economic grounds urged for the 10 and 5 year building programs were that the shipbuilding industries should be encouraged by assurances as to the amount of naval expenditures and future contracts, as will appear from the recommendations of the General Board of the Navy, at page 76 of the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1915, as follows:

On the other hand, a degree of financial security is offered the industries of the country by the foreknowledge which they thus obtain as to probable naval expenditures. This will encourage them to invest money in enlarging their plants for naval shipbuilding and all its allied industries. At the same time the strong probability of continued work throughout the period of the program will tend to reduce contract prices.

While the encouragement of industry is commendable and justifiable as a public policy with certain limits, it is carrying the principle too far to give assurances of vast expenditures from the Public Treasury and continuing contracts in the future. And it is too great a recognition of the dependency of the Government to hold that it is necessary to authorize warships far in advance of the time of building in order to secure reasonable prices for construction.

But a future building program is unwarranted and especially unwise at this time. In this day and age of discovery, invention, and marvelous progress the future can not be anticipated and modern navies authorized far in advance of their construction. Why should we attempt to fix, specify, and prescribe now the type, character, and relative number of different ships which we will begin and build in future years when conditions are in process of swift and rapid changes and the character and requirements of instruments of naval warfare in the future can not be foreseen? This question of present data and the want of knowledge of future naval conditions was considered in passing upon the five-year program by the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in the present session, as shown by the testimony given by Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, in response to questions by myself, as appears at page 3772 of the hearing of said committee:

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Secretary, have we any special information or insight as to what will be the termination of the European war?

Secretary DANIELS. None at all.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know when the war will be over?

Secretary DANIELS. We have nothing but a guess.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know who will be the victors?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know the nations that will be conquered?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know at this time what battles will be fought?

Secretary DANIELS. No; we do not.

Mr. GRAY. I mean on the sea; naval battles.

Secretary DANIELS. No battle of very great importance has been fought on the sea.

Mr. GRAY. Up to this time we have no way of determining what battles will be fought, or with what results.

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know what navies will be destroyed?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know which navies will survive after this war is over?

Secretary DANIELS. We have no knowledge.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know what naval conditions will exist after the war is over?

Secretary DANIELS. We have not even a guess.

Why should we attempt to fix, specify, and prescribe now the character, types of ships, and their accompanying auxiliary craft which we are to begin and construct in future years when the ships of our Navy and all navies have been built in time of peace without trials or tests in warfare and upon theory only, when great sea battles are imminent and are soon to be fought, and when we may avail ourselves of the benefits of experience and practice in actual war? This was one of the matters considered by the House Naval Affairs Committee, rejecting the five-year building program, as will appear on pages 3773 and 3774 of the said hearings, as follows:

Mr. GRAY. It is a fact that our Navy has been built up in time of peace and that the navies of the world have largely been built up in time of peace. That is true?

Secretary DANIELS. We have had no great naval warfare in recent years.

Mr. GRAY. Battleships last about 20 years before they become obsolete. Up to the present time we have had no great naval battles?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. The navies have been built up in time of peace, as a general rule?

Secretary DANIELS. That is right.

Mr. GRAY. All of these navies have gone into war without trial or experience in actual warfare?

Secretary DANIELS. Not actual warfare, but they are all exercised, and have maneuvers and practice.

Mr. GRAY. As far as actual war, it is theoretical as to what will be done and what tests they will stand?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes. Of course, in the Japanese-Russian War they had quite important naval conflicts, and also in the Spanish-American War.

Mr. GRAY. But these ships have had no actual trial or experience; there have been no 14 or 16 inch guns fired?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know what the result will be, so far as actual warfare is concerned—it is a matter of conjecture?

Secretary DANIELS. We did have some. We have had several engagements in the North Sea and at Doggerbank.

Mr. GRAY. But not any actual warfare, involving any great part of opposing navies?

Secretary DANIELS. That was actual warfare.

Mr. GRAY. But not tried out on a large scale or engagement?

Secretary DANIELS. They were small encounters.

Mr. GRAY. But the biggest guns have never been tried?

Secretary DANIELS. In those engagements they were tried.

Mr. GRAY. What large ship of a foreign navy has been actually fired on by the large guns?

Secretary DANIELS. The Blücher was sunk.

Mr. GRAY. I understand; but so far as that is concerned, that is only one ship. There have been no great naval battles?

Secretary DANIELS. Then, there was the Lion.

Mr. GRAY. That was a comparatively small ship—a small engagement?

Secretary DANIELS. You mean that there has been no great warfare between the fleets?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. The Lion is a 26,350-ton ship.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. There has been no great naval battle up to this time?

Secretary DANIELS. I would say that there has been no great naval engagement.

Mr. GRAY. All the great navies of the world are involved in this war?

Secretary DANIELS. All except ours. They are involved in a sense; yes.

Mr. GRAY. All of these navies are mobilized and are ready to go into war for offensive or defensive purposes?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. At this time every gunner and every man is at his post waiting, ready for a summons to be called into battle?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; they are ready.

Mr. TALBOTT. Please tell us, Mr. Secretary, why they do not have an engagement.

Secretary DANIELS. That would be very difficult.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not a fact that great naval battles are now imminent and pending—right now?

Secretary DANIELS. I would not say they are imminent and pending. I would say that the fleets are mobilized. The war has been going on for a long time. There have been no great engagements in European waters.

Mr. GRAY. Did I understand you to say that there would not be any naval engagements?

Secretary DANIELS. I did not say that.

Mr. GRAY. You do not know when they will occur or with what results?

Secretary DANIELS. That question is too hard for me. I do not think anybody knows.

Mr. GRAY. But you do know that all the great navies of the world are involved—that they are mobilized—and you do know that every man is at his place waiting for the summons?

Secretary DANIELS. That is generally understood.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not plain that under these circumstances a battle will come sooner and more certain than if they were not mobilized and if the gunners were not at their posts?

Secretary DANIELS. On the contrary, it may be the fact that each nation knows the other is ready and waiting that the moment may not come.

Mr. GRAY. Would you say that there will not be any naval battle, or they are less probable than in peace?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. I mean any naval battle in the near future?

Secretary DANIELS. No; I would not say that. I would say that it is beyond mortal man to know.

Mr. KELLEY. When both sides are ready there will be one?

Why should we attempt to fix, specify, and prescribe now the character and types of ships to be begun and built in the future, when we are in the midst of the most wonderful age of discovery, invention, and development, and in which changes are coming more swiftly and rapidly than in all the history of the world, and especially relative to naval warfare? These matters were likewise considered by the Naval Affairs Committee recommending against the five-year program, as appears on pages 3775 and 3776 of said hearings, as follows:

Mr. GRAY. There is likely to be one at any time. Is it not true also that we are in the midst of wonderful changes and rapid development, the most wonderful discoveries and inventions in the history of the world, and that a great naval battle is likely to come at any time?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. Right in the midst of the most wonderful age of advancement, invention, and mechanical science?

Secretary DANIELS. That is true.

Mr. GRAY. We are now in the midst of the most wonderful development, and there never was an age in the history of the world when there were more rapid changes than are now taking place?

Secretary DANIELS. That is true.

Mr. GRAY. And we are right in the midst of wonderful discoveries and developments with regard to the submarine, as to attacks under water?

Secretary DANIELS. That is a new phase of modern warfare.

Mr. GRAY. That is being developed every day?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. We are also in the midst of discoveries and inventions in the construction of boats to repel such an attack, are we not?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; every time there is an offensive there is some defensive discovered.

Mr. GRAY. Then, too, we are in the midst of a wonderful age of development and progress with regard to aeroplanes, are we not?

Secretary DANIELS. Just beginning.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know what those developments will be? At this time we have no way of predicting what the future will bring forth with respect to developments in aeroplanes?

Secretary DANIELS. We can not prophesy accurately.

Mr. GRAY. We do not know what the developments will be to resist an attack by aeroplanes on battleships?

Secretary DANIELS. We know they will improve all the time.

Mr. GRAY. But if there should be a great naval battle, and aeroplanes should be brought into play, we do not know what part they would be able to play in such an engagement?

Secretary DANIELS. We know a few things. We know they would play a great part in scouting.

Mr. GRAY. But we are in embryo at this time in the development and progress and invention in these things?

Secretary DANIELS. I think we are in the dawn of it.

Mr. GRAY. And we do not know what effect wireless communication will have on a naval battle, with the ability to communicate with a battleship at a distant point at sea?

Secretary DANIELS. We have learned much about wireless communication.

Mr. GRAY. But we do not know the full possibilities of it—what effect it may have on a naval engagement?

Secretary DANIELS. We know enough about it to know that it will have a very great effect.

Mr. GRAY. Is it not probable that we will know more about that in the very near future?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; undoubtedly we will know more and more.

Mr. GRAY. We are also in the midst of great discoveries and development in electricity as applied in mechanical science, are we not?

Secretary DANIELS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GRAY. Also electric light, as that is applied at sea—the searchlight; how far it can be made to penetrate the darkness from aeroplanes, and to discover vessels at sea; that is also in process of discovery and development, is it not?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; we are installing new and stronger ones at this time.

Mr. GRAY. And we will continue to progress; this is the age of discovery and development and invention, independent of war; but, in addition to that, we are right in the midst of a great world war, where all the great navies of the world are engaged, mobilized, ready to fight, with men at their guns, and which has the effect to hasten these developments, and make them come quicker and faster; is not that true?

Secretary DANIELS. Certainly.

On October 12, 1915, the General Board of the Navy submitted the five-year building program to the Secretary of the Navy. This program had been most carefully prepared from all available data at that time and represented the consensus of expert opinion and the best judgment of high officials of the Navy, as shown on pages 3776 and 3777 of said hearings, as follows:

Mr. GRAY. I would like to call your attention here to a program, on page 7 of your report—the five-year program made October 12, 1915. I take it that it is true, is it not, that this program was fairly and fully considered before it was adopted?

Secretary DANIELS. It was given great consideration.

Mr. GRAY. It was given great consideration?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. I take it that it was the result of the best judgment and counsel and advice that was possible to secure at that time?

Secretary DANIELS. It was.

Mr. GRAY. I take it that what you have specified in this five-year program was generally agreed upon in the Navy Department by the officers and experts?

Secretary DANIELS. Of course, if you will look in my report, Appendix A and Appendix B, you will find that the recommendation of the General Board——

Mr. GRAY (interposing). Oh, yes; I understand the recommendation of the General Board; that is, that they proposed a 10-year program, but when they could not get that, then this 5-year program was what you all generally agreed upon and acquiesced in?

Secretary DANIELS. The General Board wished a larger program than I recommended.

Mr. GRAY. I understand, but when they could not get the larger program, and had to take the 5-year program—in other words, when it was known that you would not recommend a 10-year program——

Mr. KELLEY (interposing). The Secretary was about to say that the General Board made another program—a five-year program.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; the General Board made a five-year program, in which they recommended that the first year we build four dreadnaught and three battle cruisers. I recommended two dreadnaughts and two battle cruisers; and they recommended a certain number of submarines, which I increased.

Mr. GRAY. Yes; I understand that, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary DANIELS. You could not say that it was generally agreed upon by the officers.

Mr. GRAY. But for the things that you did specify, and for the time you did specify, that was generally agreed upon?

Mr. BROWNING. Where do you get the idea that the General Board recommended a 10-year program?

Mr. BUTLER. He is right.

Mr. KELLEY. 1925.

Mr. BROWNING. Oh, I understand. I wanted to know why you said "a 10-year program."

Mr. GRAY. I want to be understood about that. Mr. Secretary, after you had reached the conclusion that you would not build this larger program, it was then a question as to what you would specify in a smaller program?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; we made this program upon the basis of $500,000,000 for new construction for five years.

Mr. GRAY. And when you specified what you would build, that was pretty generally agreed upon—that you were to be confined to $500,000,000, was it not?

Secretary DANIELS. I think you gentlemen have heard enough testimony before this committee to understand that no particular program was generally agreed upon.

Mr. GRAY. Did you recommend this program over the protest of the Navy Department, and the Army and Navy men?

Secretary DANIELS. Oh, no; this was the program of the Navy Department.

Mr. GRAY. Then, as a general proposition, a majority of the Navy favored this program at that time?

Secretary DANIELS. I took no referendum. I would not say that.

Mr. GRAY. Would you say that you recommended this program over the protest of the Navy Department?

Secretary DANIELS. No, I did not; and this program was made out in the Navy Department in concert with the responsible officers, on the basis of $500,000,000 for five years.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know, Mr. Secretary, whether I have been able to make myself understood by you or not. Of course, I know that there was no general agreement as to this program; that they all wanted a larger program, and that there was no unanimous agreement about any program; but after you had settled upon $500,000,000 for five years this program then represented, did it not, the consensus of opinion and the best judgment of the Navy Department at that time?

Secretary DANIELS. It did.

During the hearings of the Naval Affairs Committee and five months after the preparation of this program, many able, experienced, and efficient naval officers and experts in the line in which they testified, including the Secretary of the Navy, gave evidence, based upon new developments and observations relative to naval operations in the European war, showing that the program required to be materially changed and modified as to the relative number of different types of fighting ships, the relative importance of speed, armor protection, and heavy guns, the character of submarines, their basis of operations, and scope of action, including the aeroplane service and going to many vital elements of naval construction. Thus, the many important changes suggested in five months after the preparation of the program by reason of new developments observed in the progress of the European war, lead to the consideration of the changes which might be required in five years under such conditions as will appear on pages 3777 to 3782, inclusive, of said hearings and from which I quote the following:

Mr. GRAY. It has only been five months since this program was inaugurated and you have suggested some changes yourself?

Secretary DANIELS. I have.

Mr. GRAY. And a majority of the naval officers who have come before this committee have suggested some changes in regard to the relative importance of battle cruisers and battleships. Then the head of the submarine service has been here, and he has said that we should build only one type of submarine.

Secretary DANIELS. Yes; he has.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Secretary, this program has been in existence about five months, and you have come to the conclusion that it is necessary to make these alterations and changes. Now, what changes and alterations do you think it would be necessary to make in five years? If you have come to this conclusion in five months, how many changes and alterations do you think you would have to make in five years, when the war is over and you have had the benefit of all the experience of that war—the trials and the tests and the development of those navies resulting?

Secretary DANIELS. I have made no change at all in the ships, but only in the power and the size.

Mr. GRAY. I understand. I am not saying that you have reversed yourself.

Secretary DANIELS. I will say this: We shall make just as many changes as experience shows we ought to make.

Mr. GRAY. But you would not say, if you have made these changes in five months, by reason of things that have come up, how many changes you would have to make in five years—after the war—when probably a great naval battle shall have been fought, and there shall have been a great invention and discovery and progress? You would not undertake to say now that you would not make any changes in this program, as to the relative importance of the battleship and battle cruiser or other craft?

Secretary DANIELS. Of course I would not say that. We change when we learn.

Why should we specify ships so long in advance of the time of their building and attempt to prescribe their character and types when many of the ships we authorize now can not be and will not be begun and are not contemplated to be begun for many months or years in the future, and until after great sea battles may be fought and we can avail ourselves of actual trials and tests in war to guide us in Navy building, and which we can authorize after we have availed ourselves of such new inventions, discoveries, and developments, and before the dates for building contemplated by the program? This was another phase of the five-year building program which was considered by the committee, as will appear on pages 3783 to 3786, inclusive, of said hearings, and from which I quote the following:

Mr. GRAY. In 1917 you specify here two battleships and two battle cruisers. You will begin on those cruisers as soon as you get the authorization?

Secretary DANIELS. What is that?

Mr. GRAY. I say you will begin on those just as soon after they are authorized as you can?

Secretary DANIELS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. In 1918 you are specifying here two dreadnaughts, and not specifying any battle cruisers, and a great many of these officers say that you will have to have the most of them the first year, and you will not begin building those vessels or other craft provided for in 1918 for a year hence, will you?

Secretary DANIELS. No.

Mr. GRAY. In 1919 you specify here two dreadnaughts and one battle cruiser. You will not begin the building of those ships, any of them, until two years after this year, will you?

Secretary DANIELS. As soon after the authorization as we can.

Mr. GRAY. It is provided here that you are calling for money that is not forthcoming until 1919?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. And that is two years from now?

Secretary DANIELS. Yes.

Mr. GRAY. Coming to 1920, you have two more battle cruisers and two dreadnaughts and other craft which you will not begin to build until three years from now, and in 1921 you have more craft which you will not begin for four years. Now, do you think you will know more about what to build or what to provide next year for 1918 than you do now?

Secretary DANIELS. I think we know now that we must have ships of the largest size and battle cruisers of the fastest speed, and the only change we would have to make would be to make them larger or faster or put in new things we learn.

Mr. GRAY. I am not asking you that exactly. I wish to ask you if you think you know better now what to authorize and what to provide for than you will over a year hence, when the great European war may have been terminated and a great naval battle may have been fought, and you will have the benefit of the practical experience and result of those events?

Secretary DANIELS. You make the authorization; it is still within the power of Congress to change the types, if they will appropriate the money, if we learn something new.

Mr. GRAY. We might repudiate this whole thing, but the question I wish to ask is: Do we know better now what to build than we will one year hence? Would you say that?

Secretary DANIELS. I would not just like to say that we know better now.

We are told here to-day that warships authorized a year ago are held back in their construction awaiting observations of developments in the European war. Then how can we justify the authorization of war ships far in advance, pending the most crucial period of the world's history in such developments, when great sea battles are imminent, and when we can authorize their construction and specify their types and character and relative number for most effective operations before the time of their contemplated building?

Let our military policy be defense—full, adequate, and complete defense—not only in outward show and claim but declared in acts and deeds, and in all our preparations and accomplishments for war—defense so clear, so open, so apparent, and conclusive to the world that none can mistake our object or distrust our purpose or intent.

Let us renounce rivalry looking to world power in war and the control of the seas, the great highway of the nations, as against their common right upon the world for travel and transportation.

And the Navy we require for such full, complete, and adequate defense, let us authorize now only what we are to build now for the coming year, and then let us authorize again each year for the future in the light of the most modern inventions and discoveries, and in view of the latest developments to be observed from the operations of the greatest navies in the world engaged in war, to make our Navy most effective and impregnable for defense.

And let us realize that we stand in the midst of a world crisis, a crisis in the world's civilization, a crisis for the human race and the inhabitants of the earth. Let us realize that what we do here, the course we take to-day, will determine the future trend of civilization and human affairs.

While preparing for an adequate defense let us not by our example or rival course swing the wavering pendulum of human progress backward to barbarous war. But let us preserve our advanced leadership before the world, and thus, while maintaining our high station among the nations of the earth, lead on to the goal of peace and the planes of a higher and more exalted civilization.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps idle to protest further against the orgy of militarist extravagance which is reaching its climax in this stupendous bill appropriating for the Navy for the fiscal year 1917 the astounding total of $315,800,000. This exceeds the amount carried in the measure as it passed the House by more than $46,000,000. It exceeds the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1916 by $166,000,000. It exceeds the greatest amount ever appropriated by Great Britain in peace time by $78,000,000 and the largest made by her in war time by $55,000,000—authorizations, $488,000,000.

Is there any possible reason or excuse for this smashing raid on the Public Treasury? I have listened to most of the arguments which have been made in support of this measure. Not a little time has been devoted to the hearings held by the committees which had it in charge. But in no instance have I seen a valid reason advanced for the staggering program which this measure embodies. The whole thing is predicated on a possibility. Probabilities are disregarded. They are not even allowed a hearing. The program is prepared exclusively with reference to remote contingencies which are about as likely to materialize as a volcanic eruption in the Mississippi Valley or a flood in the Sahara.

Of course, it is possible for almost anything to happen. It were possible for this Capitol to be razed by an earthquake. It were possible for a tidal wave to sweep up the Potomac and engulf the White House and the Treasury. But who would think of making provision against contingencies so remote and so fantastically improbable? Certainly we may have a war on our hands at the conclusion of the world war raging across the Atlantic.

Britain or Germany or France or Italy or Russia may hobble over on crutches or sweep over in wheel chairs to wreak a dreadful vengeance upon us for fancied wrongs. Japan may likewise divert her attention from the business in hand, that of working out her destiny in the Orient, for the joy of crossing 6,000 miles of salt water to engage this powerful Nation in an argument over our interpretation of her Monroe doctrine. But does any sane man believe that anything of this sort is more likely to happen than the reversal of the seasons or the failure of recurrent tides? Every consideration of reason and human probability argues against the fact or the assumption upon which this amazing bill is founded. It has no solid base in logic or sound inference. It stands alone on the violent ascription to other nations of folly more unbelievable than our own.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to reproduce some figures showing the expenditures of the various naval powers of the world for naval purposes since the opening of the twentieth century. They reveal the fact that we have been striking a remarkable pace in such expenditures. As I have already pointed out, this bill carries more money than Great Britain has ever devoted to her navy, either in war or in peace. It tops Germany, France, Japan, Italy, and Russia; and is almost three times greater than Germany spent on her navy in 1914-15. Here, first of all, are some comparative figures:

Comparative appropriations for "defense."

Great Britain makes largest navy appropriation in peace times (1913)	$237,530,495
Ditto for war times (1915)	260,714,275
Largest naval appropriation by United States in peace times (1916)	149,818,563
Ditto for war times (1899)	119,921,780

And here let me reproduce the figures before alluded to. They show the total expenditures for naval purposes by Great Britain, the United States, Germany, France, Russia, Italy, and Japan during a series of years beginning with 1900. They show that with the single exception of Great Britain our outlay for naval purposes has exceeded that of any other naval power in the world.

Yet in the face of this amazing record the candidate of the superjingoes has the unparalleled effrontery to go before the country with a denunciation of the present program for its "pitiful" inadequacy. And gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have been echoing and will continue to echo the sublimated jingoism of their nominee for the Presidency. They will not cease to spread among the people the alarms they profess to feel. And in the meanwhile the patriots for profit will proceed with the capitalization of the stupendous folly to which we are committing our party and the American people. Bethlehem Steel and Amalgamated Copper and Du Pont Powder will continue to fatten their fortunate holders.

But how will it be with the plain people? What will be their verdict when returning judgment unswayed by fear shall sit upon this unspeakable extravagance, this barbaric relapse to the ethics of the jungle? I do not know how it may be with the plain people in general. But, Mr. Speaker, unless my information is strangely misleading and unless those who write to me do so for the purpose of concealing their real thought regarding the militarist propaganda which we are here ratifying and making effective there will be a day of bitter and relentless reprisal, a day when our jingo friends will call for the mountains to fall upon and hide them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I very much regret that I can not support the building program contained in the Senate amendment, for I realize full well that a vote "no" will be misunderstood by many and misrepresented by others. On the 29th of May, when this bill was originally under discussion, I used this language:

> I believe it is our duty to make the utmost preparation possible at this time, not as a naval policy for the future, for we are not in any position to fix our future naval policy now until we know what conditions are abroad, but we should take every precaution possible to prepare for the conditions that may flow from this European war, and that is to build such dreadnaughts and battle cruisers as it is possible to build with our present yards and facilities, and to build them just as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker, that was my position then. That is my position to-day, and if that was what is involved in the Senate amendment, I should very gladly vote for it, but it goes very much further than that. Members will remember that the Republican proposition then was for eight capital ships. Members will realize also that the solid Democratic side, with a few exceptions, voted against that proposition, upon the ground that it was excessive. In this bill we have not 8 capital ships but we have 16 capital ships, which is double the number that the Republican minority proposed about two months ago. If they could be built now I would be disposed to vote for it, but they not only can not be built, but the bill itself does not contemplate that they shall be, for it expressly provides that of the 10 battleships authorized only 4 shall be built as soon as practicable and 6 of them shall be begun before 1920, and of the 6 battle cruisers that are authorized, 4 shall be begun as soon as practicable and the other 2 shall be begun before 1920. Mr. Speaker, no Member of this Congress, no man in the United States to-day, whatever his experience may be, is in a position now to fix a naval policy for the future. A proper naval policy for the United States in the future will depend wholly upon what the results of the European war may be, but because of the uncertainties that are about us now, of what may result from this European war, my position has been and is to-day that we ought to make the utmost preparation now as against those contingencies and uncertainties, but we ought to leave to the next Congress or to the Congress that follows the close of the European war the determination of a future naval policy for the United States in time of peace.

Why should this Congress undertake to authorize battleships that are not to be begun for three years? Why should not that be left to the Congresses to follow us? Will not they be as competent as ourselves to determine that question? Ah, Mr. Speaker, there is just one reason and only one for this authorization for the future and that is to use the sentiment that is now pervading the country for a very large Navy and carry it through now because of the fear that at the close of this European war conditions will be such that the sentiment of the United States will be that so large a Navy as is now contemplated by those behind this proposition will not be necessary and will not be desirable.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think that anything in the way of a satisfactory Navy can be built up without a continuing policy?

Mr. LENROOT. I certainly do.

Mr. BORLAND. Not anything that will anticipate in some degree——

Mr. LENROOT. I know that we can build now as many ships as our facilities will permit, and I believe we should continue that as long as this European war exists. There is nothing to prevent us carrying it on in that period under those conditions.

Mr. BORLAND. Has not that been because of our having a very expensive Navy but not an adequate Navy?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken, and the reason for an inadequate Navy in the past has not been because the program was not adopted 10 years ago fixing the authorization during years to come. The burden was upon each Congress that had its own responsibility for the authorization of appropriations year by year. Now, in conclusion, I want to call attention to one thing. When this Republican program of eight capital ships was proposed it received a negative vote upon the Democratic side of 174, and ayes only 15. Now, we have a proposition exactly double of what the Republican program was, and I am curious to know what the Democratic side of this House will do now. You could not swallow the Republican proposition because you said it was excessive. Now, I imagine that most of you are going to swallow a proposition just twice as excessive as the Republicans proposed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, the President has pleaded for nonpartisanship upon the preparedness question. We ought to have it, and if you would forget partisanship on this question you would let this go back to conference, adopt the Republican program of eight capital ships to be constructed immediately, and bring it back to the House, and the conference report would be adopted by unanimous consent. That is what nonpartisanship would do, but because you are going to be partisan you reject the Republican program and are accepting just twice as much as you two months ago said was altogether too large in the interest of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of reluctance that I am going to vote for this conference report. I am not in sympathy with the proposition that it contains, but I recognize the fact that all legislation is a compromise and that this matter comes before the House at the close of the session, and there is not much else to do, as there is not sufficient time remaining before Congress adjourns to work out the measure properly. The fact that many of the ships proposed to be constructed under this measure can be converted into commercial carriers and used for commerce, and, as I believe, will be so used, is one of the factors which enables me to see my way clear to give it my support. Applying these great ships in ocean transportation to building up foreign trade, and thereby reduce ocean freight charges, and expand our commerce is ample justification for its adoption. A better time could not be found than now to introduce this innovation in our commercial affairs, and no one can give a valid objection to such a purpose. It will reduce ocean freight charges, inspire industry, and capture commerce. This policy once adopted will soon give us a merchant marine that will rival that of any country in the world. Many of these ships can be adapted to such a purpose, and by so employing them the money invested in them will be of great advantage to the country and produce great results for the American people.

I am unable to understand those men who are advocating a large Army and a large Navy, for what valid reason I think none of them can give, or, if they can, they have so far failed to do so. There is not a nation on the face of the earth to-day that could attack this Nation successfully. This fact is apparent to all, more so to-day than ever before in our entire history, and it is further apparent none want to do so, for the reason they are not in either a financial or physical condition to do so. Because of the great war which has been raging in Europe for the last two years every great and powerful country in continental Europe is practically exhausted in everything necessary to prosecute a war successfully with any great country, and hence is impotent to engage in a contest with us. The men qualified for military service are being killed and crippled in their warfare, their treasury is exhausted, and bankruptcy and repudiation confronts them. Men and money are absolutely essential to conduct war. Of these they now have neither sufficient for such an undertaking, and hence we are in no danger. No one will deny this. If anyone tried, how could he? What reason could he give and what facts could he produce to sustain it? This great preparation propaganda, then, must emanate from some other reason, with some other purpose in view. Be that a good or bad one, we can employ the result to great advantage by using them for commercial purposes, and will do so. This will assist the American people not in warfare but in peaceful pursuits—a noble purpose. Dangers of war nowhere threaten us, and that idea should be dispelled. Conditions throughout the world furnish ample proof of this; and if any did threaten, dangers are not imminent, because as conditions now exist we are abundantly able to not only repulse any attack but prevent the landing of a foreign foe.

Let us not mistake ourselves about conditions in this respect of foreign nations, but consider the real conditions and be not deceived over imaginary ones.

There is not a nation on the face of the earth that has facilities to land in this country an army of 100,000 men. They have not the transports to haul them to this country. They have no place to land them if we resist in this country, and they have not the men to spare to put in the service. The Army we have now in the field is amply sufficient to keep any nation or combination of nations in the world from landing at any seaport on either our western or our eastern coasts. If they were to undertake to land in this country an army to-day of 40,000 men, there is not a nation on earth that has enough transports to land that army here, or the ships to carry their supplies. If they attempted to land an army of 40,000 men from any country on the earth here to-day it would take more than 130 transports to convey them and their supplies, and there is not a nation on earth that has that many transports to be engaged for any such purpose. Now, what could an army of that size do? Before it could set foot on our shores we could drown them in the ocean. If landed, it would be helpless, and before it could be reenforced we could destroy it.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. And what could an army of 40,000 men do in the United States of America?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield the gentleman two minutes additional for his sympathy, not for his vote.

Mr. CULLOP. I thank the gentleman. There is not a place in which they could set their feet upon dry land before our forces would annihilate every one of them. There is not a city they could bombard in the United States, because they could not get within the distance to do so with the Navy we now have to-day to protect such city from such an attack.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CULLOP. I have not the time; I have only two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CULLOP. We should not be scared, scared out of our reason, by the war cry, the danger signals which have been hoisted by the people who expect to earn enormous profits from a great preparedness program. For years they have heralded all over the country, from house to house, dangers of attack from foreign foes. It has been a well conceived and a wisely arranged program; they made it do overtime, and have used every device that ingenuity could invent to bring about its adoption. From its adoption enormous profits will be derived they hope and their riches will multiply. They would precipitate war, if they could. They place the dollar above human life. They would have everybody go but themselves. They want war, but they want others to do the fighting, and as the result of war they will pile up fortunes and enjoy ease. Wretched, indeed, must be the man whose avarice inspires such an unholy purpose. But the truth exists, and with the mask torn off exposes the devilish purpose. Aye, to employ the ships for commercial purposes does not meet their approbation or serve their selfish designs. They are opposed to employing them for such useful purposes, and would prefer to see them rot in our harbors in order that they might duplicate the orders. But the President of these United States believes in peace and the employment of our facilities for peaceful pursuit and the extension of our commerce, and he will have them employed to promote our commerce and building up our merchant marine. He is not a favorite among the special-privilege class, but has dedicated himself to the service of the people and they place their reliance in him to employ every facility in his power to advance the welfare of the people. He will be returned to his great office for another term at the coming election, and the people know he will continue the great work he has begun, so that whatever is done will redound to their benefit. He has done more than any other President to make America great and powerful, to elevate the standard of Americanism, and to open the door of opportunity for all the people. He will make this work, when completed, serve their interest and spread the prosperity the country now so abundantly enjoys.

If it were not for the purpose for which these ships can be employed—and, in my judgment, will be—and the manner provided for the raising of the money to pay for this preparedness that has been mapped out I would never give it my support; but the men who have been crying for great preparation in this country, thank God, are to assist in paying for it, under the new revenue bill which passed the House and will soon pass the Senate. It lays the burden for this proposition where it properly belongs. It distributes the expense correctly and enables those who have demanded preparedness to have the opportunity to pay their rightful share for it. It is a patent fact that since the revenue bill passed the House the clamor for preparedness has not been so strong as before, and many dangers then existing have disappeared, and the alarm is not so serious as before.

Now, one other proposition. Since there has been incorporated in the legislation to carry out the preparedness program the proposition to build an armor-plate plant and manufacture the Army supplies which the Government may need, the ardor of those demanding large increased armament and preparedness in this country has been dampened. They have quieted down; their fears were allayed as they saw the opportunity for large profits disappear. They started the agitation in this country for a selfish purpose and have continued it, but now they have less grave fears of dangers which before they thought more ominous. Now they are not so enthusiastic for the proposition. Gentlemen, when you come to pay for this proposition, when you levy the taxes as proposed by the new revenue measure, it will dampen the enthusiasm of the men who have been loudest in the cry for great preparedness in this country and they will be less apprehensive of dangers from foreign attacks. These dangers do not now and never have existed save only in the imaginations of those who hoped to realize enormous profits by exploiting the people while they had them scared. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, the country demands preparedness. Answering this demand we are making an appropriation of nearly $700,000,000 to organize and equip an army and build a navy. This is more than three times as much as this country ever authorized at one time for this purpose in times of peace. It is more than five times as much as Germany ever spent in one year on her army and navy, except during actual war. It is four times as much as the cost of the English Army and her great navy in the same length of time under similar circumstances. Shall this vast sum give to us the finest army this continent ever saw in time of peace, and the greatest navy that ever floated beneath the American flag? The answer rests with us.

Mr. Speaker, money will buy guns and ammunitions. It will build and equip ships, but it can not fire these guns nor sail these ships. Men alone can do these things. It can provide the means but not utilize them. If all this vast outlay for national defense, all these millions of dollars wrung from the sweating brows of the toiling masses of this land, is to be a source of strength, we must enlist men to handle these weapons that these appropriations will provide. They must be men who serve the country because they love it, who march beneath the flag because they honor it. They must understand and revere the principles written into every fold of the flag. These money can not buy. They must come from the intelligent, patriotic, and Christian homes of this country, and must come because they want to serve their country. We have so far been unable to fill up the ranks of our Army as it was authorized before this contemplated increase. We have been unable in times of peace to recruit 100,000 men, as authorized by law previous to the enactment approved June 3 of this year. We have never been able to secure men enough to man the ships of our Navy already completed. Unless then we shall be able to do what heretofore we have been unable to accomplish these appropriations will be in vain, these untold millions spent without advantage. What changed conditions now warrant the belief, if we entertain it, that we shall be able to succeed? None. And we will not succeed until we change the conditions under which American young men are asked to give up their homes, their prospects of success in civil life, surrender all these and dedicate the flower of their youth to their country's service. We should make service in the Army or Navy a badge of honor and not one of social degradation. The vast artificial gulf that separates the enlisted man from the commissioned officer must be bridged. It not infrequently happens that in both breeding and instinct the enlisted man is much more the gentleman than the officer that spurns social contact with him. Position, tradition, and shoulder straps do not make the gentleman, nor lack of these the fellow, but it does keep out of the Army and Navy hundreds of young men of character, standing, and worth. These will never in times of peace enter either of these establishments as long as these artificial and despicable conditions remain. You can not change these conditions by piling up appropriations.

PATRIOTISM NOT BOUGHT WITH GOLD.

Money has never bought patriotic service and never can. The Northern States erred in thus thinking during the closing years of the War between the States. They offered large sums to procure enlistments, and they thereby developed an altogether new species, known as the "bounty jumper." Ancient countries tried to supplant love of country with lust for gold, and brought into existence the soldier of fortune, soldiers that followed any flag for hire, betrayed any country for gold. Patriotism, like religion and love, is found not in the auction rooms nor offers its wares in the public marts. It serves because it loves, and never that gain may reward its sacrifices. Let us make the law recognize God's only patent of nobility—character and worth. These should be the sole tests. Artificial rank and assumption should not longer be permitted to keep from the ranks of our armies and the decks of our ships the best blood of this Republic.

ENLISTMENTS IN TIMES OF PEACE TO BE CONFINED TO THE WHITE RACE.

I recently introduced a bill in this House, H. R. 17183, as one step toward making the condition of the enlisted man one that will be coveted by young men of character and standing. If made a law, it will tend to make the service more inviting. It will at least confine enlistments to the best blood that ever flowed in human veins—the blood of the white race.

In doing this I was not moved by any prejudice against the negroes. I have lived among them all my life, and after me my children will continue to live as I have done, among them, if at all, in peace. I never sought from one of them an advantage, nor an hour of service unrewarded.

THE SOUTH THE NEGRO'S BEST FRIEND.

I am proud to say that in my country a negro can come into our courts with full assurance that his rights will be respected, his every interest guarded. We deal with him honestly, justly, without hypocrisy or deceit. We appreciate his virtues and recognize his weakness. We accord him his rights and maintain our own. We do not permit him to make the laws or sit as arbiter in their enforcement, and, therefore, if for no other reason, since he sits not in the place of the lawmaker, nor wears the ermine of the judge, we decline to put into his hands the sword of our defense. The negro is temperamentally unfit to wield authority.

THE NEGRO UNFIT TO BEAR ARMS.

When armed and assembled the blood of his forefathers forges to the front, and he becomes a menace to the lives and liberties of those he is sworn to defend. I do not deny that under certain circumstances, and in the hands of strong white officers, they may show many virtues of the common soldier, but we can not afford to arm in this country any body of our citizens who can not be intrusted to bear arms except under surveillance. The negro can not be so trusted. Many instances bear testimony to this. A Republican president, nominated by negro delegates, elected by negro votes, confessed this to be true, and exercising the power and authority granted him under the Constitution as Commander in Chief of the Army, discharged a battalion of negro soldiers with dishonor for assassinating white women and children at Brownsville, Tex. A negro regiment has always been a source of irritation and danger wherever it has been stationed. They have at times not only dishonored their country's uniform, but used their country's arms to destroy their fellow citizens simply because they belong to a different race. Recently a mob of negro soldiers of the National Guards of the State of Illinois undertook to murder in a Texas town an unarmed white man. They could not be driven away until they were shot down by the white soldiers. This proves not that these negroes who committed this outrage were worse than others, but that the negro, from temperament, from racial hatreds and prejudices can never be trusted with arms in his hands in times of peace.

NEGROES NEVER FOUNDED A GOVERNMENT NOR MAINTAINED ONE.

No country ruled by negroes has ever lived in peace or risen in civilization. The only negro republic in this hemisphere changes its ruler by the sword, and not the ballot, and only one of its presidents, I believe, in 50 years has escaped the assassin's hand. What history and experience have taught us we should be unwise if we do not heed.

These sentiments are not aroused because I happen to have been born in the South and all my sympathies are with her people and her institutions. It does not arise from any recent experience or observation. Two hundred and fifty years of intimate contact, friendly and sympathetic, taught the people of our section the negro character as it is understood by no other. When war's bloody besom laid waste our fields and our homes, our people refused then to arm these people in their defense, and the negro so long as he was not armed and incited remained the most law abiding, peaceable, and faithful of human beings. No Southern woman unprotected and helpless, no child left defenseless was wronged by any member of that race. Though their liberties were in the balance in the struggle then being waged between the two sections of this country; they committed no outrages, but when those who strove with us as to the correct interpretation of the Constitution placed in the hands of the liberated slaves weapons of warfare, they created not soldiers, but brought into the field wild beasts. These spared neither woman nor child, the weak nor the strong, the church nor the home. All went down before their awakened savagery.

LESSONS OF RECONSTRUCTION.

It was urged then that the South should also arm the negro. It was pointed out that she had her last man under arms. Her ranks were no longer filled with the young and strong. These had gone down beneath the fiery scourge of war. They slept in unmarked graves on every hilltop, and every vale was a burial place. In their stead stood the old and feeble, or the very young and helpless, men so old that they fell by the wayside as they marched, or boys so young that they played with their toys by the campfires. One of these boys was found dead at Drury's Bluff in 1864, and as he lay dead on the field he had clasped in one hand an empty musket and in the other marbles and a top, the weapons of war and the playthings of a child. This necessity of enlisting children so oppressed Jefferson Davis that he cried out in anguish that "We are grinding the very seed corn of the Confederacy," but under all these circumstances our fathers after careful deliberation refused in the interest of humanity and civilization to arm the negro, not because they did not realize the desperateness of the struggle they waged, but because they knew the temperament and character of the negro race, and they would not inject barbarism into civil strife. Reconstruction but vindicated this judgment, for when all the negroes were armed war's horrors were soon forgotten in this worse than war that followed. What his temperament and character then was it is now, and the reasons that restrained them from using him as a soldier should restrain us now. Even granted for the sake of argument that the negro soldier does make a reasonably good common soldier, it is apparent to you and to me that what Lincoln said, "That a house divided against itself can not stand"; "That the country can not remain half free and half slave," applies with equal force to our Army and our Navy, which can not be half white and half black. Either the entire enlisted personnel must be white or it must be black.

SEGREGATION NOW PRACTICED IN THE ARMY.

We have recognized in some respect this fact, because negroes now are segregated into regiments wholly black. If it were not a necessity I take it that it would not have been done, and if experience has taught us that white men and negro men can not and will not serve harmoniously in a common regiment, why expect them to serve on better terms in the same brigade? They will not do it, and in this act of segregation you but emphasize the fact that young men will not enlist—I mean young white men of good character—in the service of their country in times of peace, where that service brings them in contact with negro soldiers on terms of equality, and what is true of the Army is doubly true of the Navy, because in the Navy both white and negro sailors serve aboard the same ship, eat in the same mess hall, and sleep in the same ward. Notwithstanding the fact that we have 100,000,000 people, patriotic people, people who love their country and their country's flag, we have been unable, under the most thorough campaign of advertising, to keep in our Navy 50,000 enlisted men in time of peace, and the conditions that keep men out of the service are becoming now more accentuated every day.

We can not waive aside this issue by saying that the National Government can not recognize races nor make any distinction between the white and the black. I answer you that it has done it and is doing it at this time. It does it when it segregates into separate regiments and organizations negroes who now enlist in the Regular Army. It does it when it assigns to those regiments as commissioned officers none but white men. It has done it and does it when it refuses to educate negroes in either of the academies at West Point or Annapolis. Why, bless your heart, it does it right here in this Capital city, here where Lincoln served and died, here beneath the Goddess of Liberty which crowns the dome of this Capitol, where we now sit, even here beneath the shadows of the monument of the father of his country, negroes by law are denied the right to be entertained at white restaurants, white hotels, white theaters, and places of amusement. You build for them, even here, separate schools and deny to their children the right to attend the schools for white children. And, aye, you worship the same God within separate walls and kneel at separate altars to celebrate the death and resurrection of our Savior, and when you die you are laid to rest in separate burial grounds. Then if you refuse either to live in social contact with negroes or even be buried with them, why do you by law demand, if our sons enlist in defense of our country, they shall go on terms of equality with negroes and serve under our flag in contact with them? They will not do it. White men, laboring men, the very brawn and sinew of this country, when they organize to better their conditions and make tolerable the hours of their toil, refuse to admit into their unions negro men. Their past experiences show the negro can not be trusted to maintain not only his own rights or those of his fellow man. They have broken strikes for hire and they will betray their fellow workingmen for gold. Cities, all of them located within States that adhered to the Union when the division came between the North and the South, have sought to segregate the races and prescribe by law in which particular section either race should reside.

GOD'S HERITAGE.

Through all of our social, commercial, industrial, and professional lives runs this color line of demarcation. God implanted in our bosoms the love of virtue and justice. He gave to our brains and our hands the power and skill to rear States and build homes. He gave to them different instincts and desires, and we are but true to ourselves when we undertake to preserve in all its purity this priceless heritage. The right to bear arms has always been deemed a sacred privilege and a sacred right. All nations at all times have so regarded it. In our laws and regulations we undertake to exclude from this service all those who are weak mentally, physically, or morally.

Criminals are denied the privilege of wearing their country's uniform. It has been sought at all times and in all countries to make the uniform a badge of honor. We had as well recognize now as later that if we are to have an Army and Navy—such an Army and such a Navy as the people are demanding at our hands and such an Army and such a Navy as our country needs—we must make this service so attractive that the best blood and brawn and brain of this land will deem it a privilege to wear our country's uniform.

NO POLITICAL ISSUE.

There should be no political issue in this. The political party that refuses its support to any measure that will bring only the best of the land into our country's service is bordering dangerously near treason. That party, though it may attain a temporary advantage—because negroes vote—will not long retain the confidence nor enjoy the support of those who love more their country's flag than their party's victory. Honor and patriotism, love of country, and intelligent service are the only lamps that should guide our feet in legislation, and that party that shall forget this and seek office by the suffrage of those moved only by prejudice will soon be but a memory in this land, a hiss and a by-word in the mouths of those who love their country and their country's fame. [Applause.]

I have introduced the following bill:

A bill (H. R. 17183) to prevent the enlistment of negroes in the military service of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall not be enlisted or reenlisted in the military service of the United States, either in the Army or Navy, any person of the negro or colored race.

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to use some of his time.

Mr. BUTLER. I think we have on this side yielded 15 minutes of the time given us by the chairman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has 21 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Pennsylvania 7 minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] 18 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, as I have sat here and listened to the distinguished gentlemen who have opposed the adoption of the three Senate amendments, namely, section 238, which provides for a three-year plan of construction aggregating $139,345,287, and sections 80 and 81, increasing the personnel, I have been impressed by the fact that the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the increase in the Navy represent districts that are beyond the range of the guns upon the ships of any foreign navy now afloat or are likely to reach them until the navy of the sea is superseded by the navy of the air.

There have been not a few who have also emphasized the economical side of the question. Both the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], for instance, dwelt upon the tremendous burden which this bill would place upon the backs of the people of the country. Yet it is interesting to note that the people who bear the brunt of the expense of the Government favor the enactment of this legislation while those States who are most vociferous in their opposition contribute the least, although in other forms of legislation they receive, proportionately, the lion's share of the moneys appropriated from the Federal Treasury.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, the receipts from internal revenues in the State of Kansas were $1,101,868 and North Carolina $13,651,937 as against $76,271,908 in New York; and the income-tax collected in Kansas from corporations was $460,043 and from individuals $94,975 and in North Carolina from corporations $257,825 and from individuals $123,553, while in New York corporations paid $10,221,206 and individuals $17,417,537.

This is the second occasion that I have been a Member of a minority in the majority party. When the Philippine bill was before the House 28 Democrats, of whom I was one, voted against caucus action, made possible the defeat of the Clarke amendment and the enactment of the Jones bill with the preamble. Although denounced at that time as traitors the Democratic Party in its platform adopted at St. Louis says:

We heartily indorse the provisions of the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives, further promoting self-government in the Philippine Islands as being in fulfillment of the policy declared by the Democratic Party in its last national platform, and we reiterate our indorsement of the purpose of ultimate independence for the Philippine Islands, expressed in the preamble of that measure.

And the Republican platform adopted at Chicago says:

We accepted the responsibility of the islands as a duty to civilization and the Filipino people. To leave with our task half done would break our pledges, injure our prestige among nations, and imperil what has already been accomplished.

We condemn the Democratic administration for its attempt to abandon the Philippines, which was prevented only by the vigorous opposition of Republican Members of Congress, aided by a few patriotic Democrats.

And the New York press, voicing the sentiment of the people of the city of New York, did not sound one discordant note in commending their action.

When the naval appropriation bill came before the House last May a motion was made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with amendments, and the motion was defeated—183 ayes to 189 nays, 27 Democrats, including myself, having registered themselves in the affirmative. There can be no doubt that those who voted to recommit inscribed the handwriting on the wall which influenced the Senate in its deliberations, and is, in a large measure, responsible for the increases which we are to pass upon to-day.

But there are two other matters that I desire to address myself to in the few moments of my time remaining. Of course, I am in favor of a larger Navy. I shall support every item in the bill that goes to that end. But there is no use in appropriating money to build ships if you do not provide the means with which to build them. I listened with attention to the reference to the letter submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have no reason to doubt that the cause assigned therein is a valid and legitimate excuse for the delay in laying down battleships Nos. 43 and 44, but I know the fact to be that there is room in the Brooklyn Navy Yard now for additional ways, and there has been no step taken looking to their construction. If it is intended to build those two ships and the capital ships provided for by this bill, making 10 in all, the department should not wait until the money necessary for the construction of the vessels is available, but should begin work on the construction of the ways at once.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield one more minute to the gentleman.

Mr. HULBERT. Now, Mr. Speaker, when this bill passed the House on June 2 it contained a provision for dredging the Cooper River, an approach to the navy yard at Charleston, S. C., and appropriated the sum of $175,000 therefor, in spite of the fact that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had declined to include that item in the river and harbor bill. Upon the theory that this House was in favor of improving the approach to the Charleston Navy Yard as an element of preparedness, the Senate put on an amendment, offered by the senior Senator from New York, appropriating $500,000 for the improvement of the East River at Hell Gate. This, with the provision carried in the river and harbor bill for the removal of Diamond Reef, would give a through 35-foot channel from Upper New York Bay to Long Island Sound, and would afford the capital ships of the Navy a double entrance to and exit from the navy yard, to say nothing of the commercial importance to be derived therefrom incidental to the improvement as a naval necessity. Well might the senior Senator from South Carolina attack the river and harbor bill as a "pork-barrel" proposition, when the item affecting the interests of his constituents, in which he was most earnestly interested, was, without precedent, carried in the naval appropriation bill—and he the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate! But he did not stop there. Oh, no! When the bill came before his committee in the Senate—the House having already provided the depth to meet the immediate necessities—the Senate added—

To enlarge dry docks (limit of cost $1,085,000), $750,000; foundry and forge shop, $200,000.

That is not pork; that is patriotism! But fortunately the House conferees did not agree to that amendment. It is doubly unfortunate that they did not agree to the amendment for the improvement of Hell Gate, because this Congress has gone on record by establishing as a precedent that a project to dredge a river as an approach to a navy yard is an item to be carried in the naval appropriation bill when it is located in South Carolina, but it is an item which only can be carried in the river and harbor bill when it is in New York.

I am told by the chairman of the committee that the Hell Gate item does not contain an element of preparedness. I wish that the chairman and all of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs could joint with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who leave to-morrow for New York, where they will spend Thursday and Friday making an inspection of New York Harbor and its tributaries, and if you did that you would be convinced not only of its necessity but of the stupendous blunder that is being made which, please God, we may not have demonstrated to us through the actuality of warfare until Congress can awaken to and appreciate the needs and legislate their fulfillment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

[By uanimous consent, Mr. HULBERT was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER.]

By unanimous consent Mr. KREIDER was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

[Mr. FOCHT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this great question of national preparedness for the United States, I take it that I discuss a subject in which you all have a supreme interest and one that lies very near your hearts. Regardless of what the jingoists on either side of the preparedness question may say, I do not believe there is any American who desires war or would deliberately involve this country in war. Whether you may believe in an extensive and adequate preparedness program or whether you believe in the complete disarmament of the Nation, you are all pacificists, because none of you want war. You only differ in the methods of obtaining peace. The one believes that this Nation should enter into a naval program that would mean the building of monstrous and fast sailing ships armed with guns so deadly that they could sweep the seas and coasts for a radius of 60 miles around, leaving in that awful circle nothing but devastation and death; with coasts so fortified with guns and secret mines that no enemy battleship or transport carrying great armies of men would dare venture near our shores. They say by thus preparing we are writing for ourselves a policy of insurance that would be a faultless guaranty against serious disputes with neighboring nations.

The other side denounces such a scheme as barbarous in the extreme; that it is only an invitation and a challenge to fight; that it is placing a chip upon our shoulder accompanied with the dare to the nations of the world to knock it off. They hold to the belief that the preparedness course breeds inevitable trouble.

Mr. Speaker, I can not help but think that each one of us, regardless of what view we take, is an unqualified pacificist.

None of us want war, but so partisan have become the various advocates that each often denounces the other as being either a corruptionist or a coward. One accuses the other of deliberately planning war for political mercenary purposes. The other denies this and immediately indicts his brother of the charge of cowardice and says to him, "In your spineless timidity you will render your people defenseless and turn your country over to any enemy that will destroy your property and ravage and violate your homes."

But these are only the unsupported charges of the poorly poised mind of the jingoist of both sides. If I happen not to agree with you, you ought not charge me with all these political and mercenary crimes. If you do not agree with me, I should not charge you as being spineless to the degree that you would not, if need be, defend your homes against any and all invaders, and neither do I. The one is just as patriotic and loyal, just as courageous and brave as the other. We would all attain the same peaceful end, but by a different method.

The pacificist, who sees danger in a great and imposing Navy and an increased standing Army, it seems to me, forgets the fact that many of the great nations of the world have gone war mad, and just at what moment some war-crazed nation may attack us I do not know. Indeed, I do not know whether or not we will ever be so attacked, and neither does the man know who cries out against preparedness. One month before that gigantic struggle across the waters began there was no one on this side or on yon side of the Atlantic Ocean who would have believed the present war possible, and the man who would have predicted it would have been charged with lunacy. Yet that war did come, and it is still in progress, without the end in sight.

The same men who now say that this country is free from danger were at that time predicting that the world had forever freed itself from the ravages of war. So sure were they that the dogs of war had been so securely chained that they could never break their fetters, that they had even coaxed the dove of peace to build her nest and hatch her brood in the very mouths of the cannon that are to-day belching forth a destruction to all Europe's civilization. Their theory was a very beautiful and gentle one and quite soothing to the nerves, but the events of the last two years have sadly shattered their claim, and for these reasons I am not willing to guess that when this conflict is over it will mean the everlasting dethronement of the god of war. I am fearful that my guess might be wrong; and if wrong, our Nation would stand helpless and trembling at the mercy of other countries that had guessed the other way.

For my own part I claim to be an unqualified pacificist; that is, I abhor war. I look upon it as a supreme demonstration of the very lowest degree of barbarism. It leaves in its awful wake death and destruction. It bows the head of a nation in deepest and lasting sorrow. It strikes a deadly blow at civilization. Yet with all war's horrors and all of its miseries in its ever onward march, civilization has not yet reached the point where it settles all its disputes by peaceful and orderly methods, but, on the other hand, each year invention gives to the world other weapons of destruction much more horrible and deadly than did its predecessors.

Individuals have for the most part learned the art of living in unity as brothers, but nations have not; and because nations have not I am a pacificist who is unalterably in favor of a preparedness that will make the world afraid; not that we may have war, but that we may have peace. There is no danger of the development of a military spirit in America. Militarism can only live and grow and develop in a country that is overcrowded in population and poor in natural resources. Although such a nation may have wealth, yet is she impoverished. In her desire to find homes for her overcrowded population and markets for her surplus products she must acquire other territory, and she must force her way into foreign markets.

The United States need have no fear from this condition, because within her own borders she has unlimited territory yet unsettled. Some of it stands to-day in its virgin state. We have home markets fully supplied and with a surplus for which the world continuously clamors. To give you some faint idea of the vastness of our unsettled domain, let me remind you that Texas alone, with its 4,000,000 population, has the area and fertility of soil sufficient to support a population of 56,000,000 more inhabitants. There is nothing that the world needs in all of its commerce that Texas alone can not supply. Just think of one State in this Union of States having a population of only 4,000,000, yet there is room in it for 60,000,000, and room, too, for them all to live, build homes, and prosper, and this on their own resources.

So, you see that the United States wants nothing from her neighbor except what her neighbor is willing and anxious to sell her in peaceful trade commerce. But all nations are not so happily situated. Some need markets and others territory, and much as we may despise the idea, yet it is true that what they can not buy they will use the tactics of the highwayman to obtain. And these warring nations are not barbarians either, because the present war is now raging right in the midst of a Christian civilization, a civilization that it was supposed had reached the zenith of culture; and that this war may be more deadly and strike horror deeper into the hearts of nations the inventive genius of all mankind is working night and day to give to the warring nations other implements of death and other machinery of destruction that civilization may be further sacrificed at the altar of the war god. Man in peace is the most gentle and considerate of all the creatures of God, but man aroused is more ferocious and devilish than all combined. I know that we cry out against war, and I am glad we do. I hope the youth of this land will be taught the belief that a war of aggression is wrong; but war has been with us in every age since time began. Man in his primitive state fought with clubs; then with flint-headed spears; then came the bow and arrow, where at longer range and concealed from the foe's view the warriors could fight; then gunpowder made the rifle possible; and then the cannon came for longer range on both land and sea.

But to-day the awful implements of modern warfare have crazed the eastern world. To-day modern implements have changed the military rules. Ships larger and more impregnable and equipped with guns so mighty and so deadly that they defy both distance and resistance plow the seas; armies of men—not thousands but millions—tramp the earth, keeping step to martial music, armed with guns big and little that throw lead and steel and fire and send choking gas into the throats of contending armies; great monsters of the sea, whalelike, swim far under the surface and rising unnoticed hurl for miles a deadly torpedo which, striking a vital spot of another great monster riding the waves, sends it down with men and guns on board. But not content to fight on land and on and under sea man sails miles high above the surface of the earth, and from his mighty ship that rides the air drops death and destruction down upon the heads of armies and spires of cities, putting the thunderbolts of Jove to shame. This is modern warfare. It is science battling science. It is the intellect of man running riot. Many of these projectiles dropped from these airships weigh more than a ton, and striking, great buildings are razed to the ground and acres of earth are torn away. All these things have made war horribly unthinkable.

Mr. Speaker, we find the eastern world thus prepared and thus inclined to wage this kind of wicked and brutal warfare. We see them fighting for the commerce of the world, for territory, and the mastery of the seas fully armed with all these modern implements of ruin, and in their fierce fury we see them at times turn on us with mailed fists and gritting teeth. As our President would say, "We see the sparks flying thick and fast, dropping here and there and everywhere." We are the biggest and richest Nation in the world. We have everything for which those fighting countries clamor, and practically nothing with which to defend these priceless possessions, and notwithstanding this there are many patriotic and intelligent men and women among us who say we must not build more ships and coast defenses, and must not increase our Army up to any degree of fighting extent. They say to kill is wrong. I say so too, but I further say it is your duty to protect your family from death against an invader of your home even if in doing so you are compelled to take the life of the outlaw.

So are we as citizens bound to protect the life of our Nation against any foe who seeks the invasion of our country.

Mr. Speaker, on our east and west and south we have many thousands of miles of unprotected coast line. On our north and south we have a land border over which a hostile army could march practically unhindered. Because of our lack of preparation, Japan to-day on our west, combined with any one of the great powers of the east, could have us at their mercy. With our lack of ships and coast defense a foreign power could sweep our eastern coast with its mighty guns, land an invading army on our shore, and take complete possession of all of our munition and other manufactories, and in our helplessness we would be compelled to accept such terms of peace as our invaders might name, and surely the price would be enough to pay that country's war debt. Some of us cry out against a preparation for our own protection because of the cost in money, but how would they like to pay billions for the settlement of Europe's war? No; I do not magnify; I only state what might occur and what I think probably will occur if we are not prepared.

This is not a nightmare or the revelations of an ugly dream, as some declare, but a logical conclusion based upon all the facts. Remember we have a Monroe doctrine that must be upheld at all hazards, under the terms of which we are the guardian of all the world as far as the interests of each nation's citizens are connected with the Western Hemisphere. Other countries may soon demand large indemnities for the loss of life and property of their citizens in Mexico, and Mexico can not settle for one dollar on the hundred. In lieu of money territory may be demanded, and at that instant the hoary old ghost of the Monroe doctrine will loom up to stare us in the face. This is only one danger out of many that occurs to me now, but it serves the purpose I have in mind.

You ask me to point out the source of danger? You ask what countries seek an invasion of our soil? I answer I do not know, but my warning is, prepare our Navy and our coasts to that extent that we may repel an attack from both England and Japan. England has been our life-long enemy and Japan now feels that we are not her friend. England's interests in Mexico have been assaulted and her people murdered there. Besides she is jealous of our increased commerce of the seas. If our foreign commerce grows stronger we will that much more pinch her toes. Practically her only source of wealth is in carrying on the sea commerce of the great commercial nations of the world. If you take this from her, her fountain of life, she will fight. Yet we as a nation have just as much right to the freedom of the seas as she, and all of us are demanding our rights.

Therefore, I have in mind the firm conviction that our two most probable enemies in the future will be Japan on the one side and England on the other, and if we are not prepared, I am afraid they will sometime strike us a simultaneous blow, and in order to avoid this blow I counsel now that our Nation provide for our protection a Navy and coast defense that would render our security absolute. You ask how many ships would this require, the kind of ships and the class of guns I would build and have, and I answer you by saying I do not know and neither do most of you, and, therefore, let us leave that question to the great military and naval experts of our country who have made this a life study. You and I who have other duties to perform in life can not and do not know. If you are sick you seek the advice of a physician that you may regain your health; if you are driving a great distance with a horse and buggy and if your horse becomes lame from the loss of a shoe, you take him to a blacksmith; if you have a case to be tried in court you secure the services of a lawyer, and so it is with the kind and numbers of our ships. We should rely upon the knowledge of the experts.

A few days ago in my local town some men were discussing this same question—the extent of our preparation. Some believed in great preparation; some believed in no preparation; and some believed in a very conservative program. In their midst was a little boy, about 8 or 9 years of age. He was listening to the conversation with wrapt attention. Finally, he said: "I think we ought to be prepared to whip them all, if we have to." I sometimes think this was one of the best, if not the best, speeches I have ever heard upon this all-engrossing question.

Mr. Speaker, what I have already said has been entirely with reference to our Navy and coast defenses. This is our first great line of defense. The sea invader must first run this blockade before he sets a hostile foot on our soil. For this reason I would have them as impregnable as ships and guns and mines could make them, and in doing so we play the game of safety first from an economical standpoint.

Next comes our second line of defense—our land forces. This line is divided into two branches, the Regular or standing Army and our volunteer citizen soldiers. The one is a professional soldier, trained in the art of war, of which to-day we have, in round numbers, about 100,000. The latter is the citizen who follows the peaceful avocations of life and only gives them up when war is declared and there is a general call to arms. I do not believe in an enormously large standing Army, although I think it should be sufficiently large for needed purposes. As a Member of this body I voted for an amendment to the Hay Army bill that sought to give the President, in time of need or when war was imminent, power to fill the Regular Establishment up to 220,000 fighting men. In fact, I would have voted for an amendment that, when war was imminent, would have given the Chief Executive unlimited discretion. But in time of peace we do not need a large and imposing Regular Army. What we do need—and I wish it were the policy of this Government to have made for its use, if war should come—is a gun, a goodly supply of ammunition, and other equipment to put at the disposal of every man in this country of fighting age and health. On the first call of our country when danger confronts us we can get the men, but it takes months and years to get the soldiers' equipment. Without his fighting implements ready, many of our brave men would be needlessly killed at the outset.

I have no fear that he will be sacrificed because of lack of training but only from lack of equipment. It is the history of nations that in war the nation does not depend on land upon the trained and seasoned soldier, but the men who win the battles are the great armies of citizen soldiery. This was true in every war we have had since the birth of our Nation, and so signally demonstrated in the Civil War.

I think one of the lost illuminating examples of raw recruits fighting seasoned soldiers is found at the battle of New Orleans, fought January 8, 1814.

It was in the early part of the winter of 1813 when the authorities in Washington had heard that England had assembled an imposing army on the Island of Jamacia with the intention of transporting this army in her best ships to New Orleans. New Orleans was to be captured and thus a foothold again obtained in America. Nothing like this great army had ever before been seen in American waters. It was composed of 20,000 of Britain's best-trained soldiers fresh from their victories in France. With such an imposing army of seasoned soldiers it seemed that New Orleans was destined to be taken. A courier was at once dispatched from Washington to find Gen. Jackson, who was somewhere in the vicinity of New Orleans waging successful warfare against hostile Indians. He was finally found, and the orders of the President of the United States were delivered to him. These orders were, "Go to New Orleans and defend the city against any and all invasion." The orders did not tell him how to do it but what to do. Immediately Gen. Jackson started on horseback accompanied by five of his staff. For days and nights they rode through the long avenues of forestry, finally reaching the city of New Orleans early in December. That gay and fashionable city had already heard of its proposed doom, and the great preparation for the season's festivities had been abandoned and all was disorder and excitement in this beautiful creole city.

They all knew what to expect should the city fall into the hands of the red-coated soldiers of England, because the report of the way they had debauched the women of France had already reached the ears of the men and women of that gay city. The women thought of their fate and trembled. The men thought and looked sullen, but Gen. Jackson soon inspired them with a new hope, for he told them he had come to defend the city. Every man and boy of New Orleans volunteered in the defense of the city. Couriers were sent in every direction for miles around, and those sturdy hunters, trappers, and planters soon came to the city's rescue, each carrying with him his own powder and his own gun. The city then set back four miles from the river's bank, and a great bulwark of earth was built between the city and the river, and all was in readiness when the great ships carrying the English soldiers hove in sight coming up the Mississippi River. As these white-sailed ships appeared in sight 2,000 men, armed with their own squirrel rifles, were lying behind that bulwark of earth. Behind them was the great Crescent City, with its women and children and old men depending upon these 2,000 sturdy defenders. It was known should these defenders fail the youth and beauty and virtue of the Creole City would become the sport and mockery of these 20,000 red-coated libertines of England. But Gen. Jackson encouraged them by saying, "We can not fail," although they outnumbered them 10 to 1 and the 20,000 men were trained and seasoned soldiers, while Jackson's men, for the most part, had never trained a day or had ever seen a battle. Twenty thousand red-coated soldiers landed on the banks of the Mississippi River and formed a line of battle and commenced its march upon the city. Jackson only gave one command. He said, "Men, do not fire until you can see the whites of the enemy's eyes, and when you can do this pick out your man and shoot." This was the only order given, and it was obeyed, and when that red-coated army was within 100 yards of this breastwork of earth these 2,000 defenders arose as one man and fired into the very face of the approaching regiments of men and then reloaded, fired again and still again, and the battle of New Orleans was fought and won.

It lasted only 45 minutes, but in that time England's 20,000 well-drilled, well-equipped soldiers had backed away from the fire of these 2,000 Americans who were defending their homes. On the American side seven men were killed, but that night when the sun went down and the stars came out it was found that 4,000 red-coated Englishmen had turned their paling faces to the moonlight and as many more lay wounded and helpless upon that bloody battle field. Ten days later the remnants of that once proud army quitted our soil forever.

From the beginning of time down to the present day history bears witness to the fact that the country that maintains large standing armies of mercenary soldiers sooner or later will decay. Perhaps the most striking instance is found in the fall of the Roman Empire. For century after century imperial "Rome sat upon her seven hills," we are told, and "from her throne of beauty and power she ruled the world." So strong were the Emperors of that country that no other people dared to question Rome's authority. Large standing armies, well equipped, forced the whole world to pay tribute in money and obedience to her rulers. The people of the world paid for the upkeep of this mighty army. It was back so far ago that, about the dawn of the Christian era, this power of Rome was first challenged. This power was then questioned by a people that lived far to the north and west. These were the German tribes that had banded together for a common protection and resolved to defy the edicts of Rome. These German tribes heretofore had been easy victims to the power of the Cæsars, because before then they had never combined, but at that time, nearly 2,000 years ago, there arose among them a great warrior, whose name was Herman, and he consolidated these German tribes, and all the stronger men armed themselves with clubs, swords, and spears and refused longer to pay tribute to this Government of the south. It was Octavius Cæsar who was then on the throne of Rome and he sent his best pick, best-trained, best-equipped soldiers, 40,000 in all, each mounted upon a great horse, into the German woods to bring the revolters to subjection.

This was one of the most fierce and awful battles that had been fought up to that time. These united tribes, under the great leader, Herman, formed a line of battle in a great forest. This line of battle was formed in a circle, with six or eight men deep. In the center of this circle the soldiers put their wives, their mothers, sisters, and daughters, so that at their backs would be everything that was dear to them in life, and thus they stood when they were charged by the armies of Rome. Three times the Romans charged on their great horses, but three times they were repulsed, and at the end of the third charge more than half of the Roman Army lay dead in this German forest, and it was a sorry and crippled remnant of that once proud army that was left to go back to Cæsar and tell him of the crushing of the Roman power.

These defeats are easily explained. The one is a mercenary soldier and the other fights for home, love, and country. It is patriotism fighting against the professional soldier, who often fights for pay.

So, I am not much interested in a standing army. All I want to know is that our Government will have a gun and ammunition and a full equipment to put into the hand of every able-bodied man in America should we get into war with any of the great nations of the world.

As I have said before, in time of war this Nation never has depended on land upon a standing army, but the men who fight the battles and win the victories are the volunteer citizen soldiers.

We all recall how back in the sixties, at the beginning of the Civil War, the President of the United States made his famous call for 75,000 volunteers to defend their flag and Union, and you remember how that call was answered by the overwhelming response from 300,000 strong. These are the men, together with their comrades who later volunteered in the defense of their country, upon which the Nation depended at that, its darkest hour. So it will be again if a war crisis ever comes.

I am not afraid of the American people or any of them should war come with any country, because our people from wherever they came are now Americans, and in case of war they would have behind them their women and their homes and all that life holds dear for them.

The war clouds hang thick about the world, and it seems to me that it is high time that we should quit slandering a big element of our population by calling them hyphenated Americans and let us band together for our own protection.

There never was a nation whose citizenship stands and always has stood more ready to defend even with its blood the vital rights of her people than America. There is instilled in the veins of her men a patriotism that dictates and impels a love of country that makes the American masses follow the Stars and Stripes even to the last flutter of her folds. The vital rights of our citizens must be held sacred any and every where. But we have no time or patience to look about us seeking an opportunity to avenge a fancied wrong. Our American men and women are essentially believers in fair play, and as we go about our daily avocations and pause in our hourly grind of business to look with horror on the awful waste of life and blood on Europe's thousands of battlefields our true American sporting blood demands hands off. We despise and denounce a policy of alleged neutrality that would have the appearance of bias and prejudice in favor of one side to the detriment of the other. When we do this we play the part of the hypocrite, and hypocrisy is despised by our people. It has no room in the hearts and minds of our one hundred million of men and women.

Our rights as a neutral Nation are divided into fancied, doubtful, and real. As to the first two I care nothing, but as to the last, our real rights, I demand and you demand that they shall be held as sacred as the virtue of our homes. I care not who the invader of our real rights may be, this enemy will be met at our borders and our shores by every man and boy among us who has the strength to carry a gun, and back of this determined army of citizen soldiers you will find the mothers, daughters, wives, and sisters waving and shouting them on to battle.

That is the spirit and the courage of American womanhood when our vital rights are defied; but those brave and courageous women do not want and will not sacrifice their loved ones at the altar of a fancied or a doubtful right. They are too big and generous to quarrel about nonessentials, and too honest to demand of another nation the things that we would challenge as our privilege under a like circumstance.

Mr. Speaker, there are 100,000,000 citizens of the United States made up of native-born and citizens by adoption, born in some other country, and it is the pride of our Nation that the one loves the old flag with as much unselfish and tender affection as the other. Oh, I am not unmindful of the abusive accusations that have been heaped against the German-American and the Irish-American elements of our citizenship. But never was there a more false and damnable charge lodged against 30,000,000 citizens of our country. Because some half dozen men born on foreign soil, it is alleged, attempted to destroy American munition factories practically every man in America with Irish or German blood in his veins is charged with treason. He is designated as a hyphenate, and as his accusers use the term it is intended to stamp him with the greatest odium. So tight have been drawn the lines by these accusers that the Irish or German born, or they with this blood in their veins, are not permitted to express a sympathy for the country of their childhood less they be condemned at once by those who cry "Hyphenate!" This phrase first found its way across the waters to this country from England, and it at once found lodgment and hospitable entertainment in the hearts of the munition manufacturers and the American capitalist who floated the half billion dollar loan to the allies. These are the men who coined, defined, and gave wide circulation to the phrase "hyphenated American." So well and faithfully have these eastern capitalists in conjunction with their debtors across the water worked this phrase that a really true American dare not express his opinion of the fighting qualities of the soldiers of the Central Powers without being charged with disloyalty. Disloyal to what? The cause of the allies? If that is what you mean I, for my single self, plead guilty.

I am only loyal to America, and I do not propose to have any man or set of men across the Atlantic Ocean tell me when my rights have been invaded and when and whom I must fight. When our rights have been violated we will know it, and we will not have to seek foreign advice. I am neither pro-ally nor pro-German, but I am intensely pro-American, and being pro-American I shall protest whenever the occasion warrants against our Government doing anything that will tie America's hands.

While I am pro-American, I am no more so than millions of German and Irish born who are to-day citizens by adoption of America. Their homes are here; their wives and daughters and sons are here. America is home to them, and the Stars and Stripes is their flag. They have given ample proof of their devotion to America and America's institutions, and there is no occasion for the President of the United States or any other man to call them hyphenated Americans.

Our country is neutral, or at least we claim it to be neutral, and as long as we proclaim a neutrality I have no objections to those of us who were born on German soil or born in this country of German parentage to sympathize with their old friends and neighbors and relatives over there who are to-day engaged in that bloody struggle of death. Indeed, as long as we are neutral I think that these loyal Americans would be inhuman if they did not. Did they not, I am afraid they would not be the good, industrious, law-abiding American citizens that we have always found them to be.

The man who can forget his relatives and his friends and turn to them a deaf and indifferent ear when they lie wounded and dying on the field of carnage I am afraid will make a poor excuse for an American citizen. To-day all Europe is soaked in blood, and I certainly would fear the man here in America who does not sympathize with the soldier of the land from whence came his father and his mother, and I insist that an expression of that sympathy only reflects great credit.

But, should our country ever be compelled to go to war, whatever may be the cause and whoever may be the foe, then the test will come; and I know that these men who live in our midst and who make for us a better citizenship, who were born in Germany and their stalwart sons born here in America, will prove their patriotism and their courage under the Stars and Stripes as they have before on a hundred battle fields.

This is the only test of loyalty to their country, whatever may be their notion of the contending banners in the European war.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. KEARNS was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, those who oppose this measure say that they favor reasonable protection. Now, what is reasonable protection? In naval power we are fourth. I think protection in reason should mean a Navy large enough to defend us from attack. What is the use of having any other kind of a Navy? To build ships, but not enough to protect us against a nation that might attack us, is indeed a wicked waste of money. I do not think the Members of this House who have given consideration to the question of the naval strength of this country think that we are any other than fourth, and a very poor fourth at that. The Congress need not fear that we are going to become a world sea power by the carrying out of this program, because to my mind the building of these 16 ships will leave us third and not second. If we had carried out the program as contained in the bill which left the House, providing for five battle cruisers, we would have been not only fourth, but at the conclusion of that building program Japan would lead us. I believe that Japan to-day is building as many ships, or has a program for as many ships in three years as we contemplate to build in four or more years under this program. I believe in having a Navy that is strong enough to defend our people and their interests against the attempted invasion of any power on earth. [Applause.] Unless conditions greatly change I believe that the day is coming when we are not going to be satisfied without having the incomparable Navy that President Wilson spoke about. It is our greatest defense. World conditions and business rivalry will compel it. The freedom of the sea is and will be more and more of vital concern to our great and rapidly developing country. The astonishing thing about the President's attitude is that while he favors this incomparable Navy, he advocated Secretary Daniels's program of five battle cruisers, which would still leave us fourth when those five were completed, and the present building program of Japan would endanger our position even as fourth.

Washington to-day is as vulnerable as it was in 1812. Relatively so is New York. So is Boston; so is Philadelphia and many other important cities, beehives of great industries and large business. Indeed, a foothold by the enemy in New York or Philadelphia would endanger the principal coal fields in Pennsylvania. Besides the destruction of life, billions upon billions of money could be seized for indemnity.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] said that a foreign nation could not transport troops to this country. It was accomplished in the War of 1812; and how have the great nations in the European war done it? How has England transported 5,000,000 soldiers and millions and millions of tons of munitions of war, and millions upon millions of tons of foodstuffs, without the loss of a transport, frequently as great a distance as that between the ports of a foreign country and this country?

Mr. BRITTEN. And Germany's navy is supposed to be superior to ours, is it not?

Mr. FARR. Including that of Austria, Germany's navy is easily twice as strong as ours. Any gentleman here can prove that to his satisfaction by going down to the Office of Naval Operations and seeing the different navies in miniature. Austria and Germany combined are twice as strong as we are, and I believe Germany has built many more ships since the war started than we have, and so has England.

One gentleman has referred to the fact that England has sustained great losses. She has lost fighting ships to the extent of about 400,000 or 500,000 tons, but Great Britain has put on the sea since the war began, up to six months ago, 1,000,000 tons, as much or more than we have in total, and Germany has done nearly as well. Every one of the big nations now engaged in war is stronger on water than when the conflict began. Germany can build 25 dreadnaughts simultaneously and so can Great Britain. When we develop our Government yards we can build 15 battleships simultaneously, and our private yards, with additional equipment, could construct 10.

Mr. BORLAND. How does the gentleman explain the fact that we are such a poor fourth, in view of the large amount of money previous administrations have spent on our Navy, as compared with Germany and Japan?

Mr. FARR. For the reason that we pay our men fair wages. We give them good food. We dress them well. German and Japanese sailors and soldiers are under conscription and get very little money. There is not a great difference in the amount of money we spent on matériel. I want to tell the gentleman that Germany has not disclosed the amount of money that she has spent for her navy, and neither is Japan doing that to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] very generously yielded to me additional time, which I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, this conference report represents the combined judgment and wisdom of the great Committees on Naval Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, and we are told it is favored by the President, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

No one is wise enough to know what the conditions of the world will be at the close of this the greatest war in history. We do know that the nations engaged in the war are piling up national debts of such size that the interest alone will amount to such a gigantic sum that it will drive the people of those countries to desperation. Great Britain has increased her per capita debt to more than 160 per cent since the war began and is just floating a new debt of $250,000,000. Germany has increased her debt over 500 per cent.

I herewith give a summary of the approximate borrowings of the different nations since the outbreak of the war:

The British Empire	$5,739,000,000
France	2,078,000,000
Russia	2,591,000,000
Italy	425,000,000
Germany	6,415,000,000
Austria	1,831,000,000
Turkey	250,000,000
Total	19,329,000,000

To this must be added $70,000,000 for Canada and $15,000,000 for India. These statistics were computed several months ago. Out of the manufactured products, out of the farm products, out of labor must come an annual interest charge alone aggregating several thousand millions of dollars annually. This is certainly an unusual condition and one fraught with much danger.

BALANCE OF POWER.

The balance of power which has insured the peace of Europe for years is now destroyed and the victorious nations, which are bound by alliances which make them almost a single nation, will emerge from the war arrogant and aggressive, with their moral senses for justice and law so callous that treaties and international law will be no protection.

As has been said by a gifted orator:

> You may talk of orderly tribunals and learned referees; you may sing in your schools the gentle praises of the quiet life; you may strike from your books the last note of every martial anthem, and yet out in the smoke and thunder will always be the tramp of horses and the silent, rigid, upturned face. Men may prophesy and women may pray, but peace will come here to abide forever upon this earth only when the dreams of childhood are the accepted charts to guide the destinies of men.

The fierce contest for international trade is going to increase the chances of war. The United States, before the European war began, had greater national wealth than Great Britain, Germany, and France combined. Since the war began we have been piling up wealth at an unprecedented rate, while the countries at war have been piling up debts at the rate of millions per day. The United States has a large portion of the gold of the world. With these conditions staring us in the face, I believe that we must be prepared to protect ourselves. I believe that only the sense of fear that nations have of us will keep us out of war. I have no faith in treaties or international law when I see all the nations engaged in the war openly violating fundamental rules of international law, when half of the world is in a frenzy and a state of mind bordering insanity.

The responsibility of this Congress in representing 100,000,000 of people is tremendous. We have the responsibility of preserving and keeping alive free institutions, and, in addition to preserving our own institutions, we must stand as a guardian to protect republican institutions in the whole Western Hemisphere, and perhaps the world. We can not afford to take any chances when by a mere money consideration we can be absolutely safe.

The chances that we take by not being fully prepared are attended with such grave consequences, while the risk of over-preparedness is only a matter of dollars and cents.

I have voted for the largest measure of preparedness on the naval bill that has been proposed since the introduction of this bill. I voted for the Browning amendment, which our Democratic friends claimed was hysterical, and yet, all but a very few of the Democrats are now supporting the present bill which carries a heavier appropriation even than the Browning amendment. While I am on the subject of preparedness I wish to say that at all times I have supported the conference reports of the Senate and House and voted consistently for the most effective preparedness proposed. I voted for the Hay conference bill in preference to the Senate Chamberlain bill. The Hay conference bill, in my opinion, gives us greater preparedness and at less cost than the Chamberlain Senate bill. This is now generally conceded, although at the time a superficial examination would lead one to believe that the Senate bill afforded greater preparedness.

COMPARISON OF HAY AND CHAMBERLAIN BILLS.

The Hay Army reorganization bill which I voted for provides for a maximum Regular Army of 207,000 men with an enlistment of two years with the colors and five years in the reserves. The Chamberlain Senate bill provides for a maximum Regular Army of 250,000 men with an enlistment of three years with the colors and four years in the reserves. Assuming that the Army is enlisted up to the maximum provided for by each of these bills, under the Hay bill we would have 207,000 men; under the Senate bill we should have 250,000 men; under the Senate bill we would therefore have at the first enlistment an Army larger by 43,000 than under the Hay bill, but at the expiration of the second year the 207,000 serving under the Hay bill would go into the reserves subject to call at any time, and the Regular Army at the beginning of the third year would be replenished by 207,000 new recruits. We would thus have a Regular Army of 207,000 men and 207,000 reserves subject to call, making a total of 414,000, as compared with 250,000 under the Senate bill.

At the end of the fourth year the Regular Army, under the Hay bill, would again go into the reserves and the Regular Army at the beginning of the fifth year would again be replenished by 207,000 new recruits, making a total in the Regular Army and in the reserves subject to call 621,000. By that time, under the Senate bill, 250,000 soldiers would have been placed in the reserves and another Regular Army of 250,000 enlisted, making a total of 500,000 under the Senate bill, as compared with 621,000 under the Hay bill.

I herewith give a table showing the increase under the respective bills in parallel columns. A comparison of costs is also given:

	Under Hay bill.	Under Senate bill.
First enlistment	207,000	250,000
Beginning of third year	414,000	250,000
Beginning of fifth year	621,000	500,000
Beginning of seventh year	828,000	750,000
Cost for 6 years	$1,242,000,000	$1,500,000,000

Mr. HELGESEN, of North Dakota, has made a study of this matter, and anyone who will read his speech of August 10 in the RECORD will be clearly convinced, if they are in doubt, as to the Hay conference bill being the strongest preparedness measure. I herewith print a letter from the Secretary of War commending in the strongest possible terms the Hay conference bill:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 24, 1916.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have had the provisions of House bill No. 12766 carefully analyzed and compared with the provisions of the bill drafted by the General Staff for reorganizing the Army. The comparison and analysis were made by a member of the General Staff, and the memorandums embodying the results of that comparison and analysis are inclosed for your information.

I fully indorse the statement made in one of the memorandums that the bill recently agreed to is the most comprehensive measure looking to military preparedness that has ever been passed by Congress. Assuring you that the bill is very satisfactory to me and that the untiring efforts of the Senate and House to afford the people of this country adequate military protection are deeply appreciated, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

I voted for and was in favor of an amendment providing for an enlistment of one year with the colors and five years in the reserves, and I believe that we could get enlistments much faster with such a law. The best army experts in Europe claim that in one year in the regular army a man can become a good practical soldier. Hundreds of thousands of young men would enlist for a year with the colors and five years in the reserves subject to call that would not go in for two years. Under the present bill, with the aid of recruiting stations all over the United States and with the aid of moving-picture slides, we are only recruiting our Army at the rate of less than 4,000 a month, which would take 25 months to obtain 100,000 men.

CHAMBERLAIN BILL WOULD HAVE DESTROYED NATIONAL GUARDS.

Again, the Chamberlain bill providing for a continental army would absolutely destroy the National Guards.

Representative CRAGO, of Pennsylvania, lieutenant colonel in the National Guard, Pennsylvania, who had been a member of the National Guard 25 years, in a speech in the House of Representatives when the Senate bill was under consideration, pointed this out clearly.

Representative ESCH, of La Crosse, Wis., who organized a company of National Guards at Sparta and also at La Crosse, and who was appointed judge advocate general of the State under Gov. Upham, and who served several years on the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, was also against the Chamberlain bill and believed that it would destroy the National Guards. When the Chamberlain bill came into conference it was shown to be an impractical measure; and out of the conference came the Hay conference bill, which I was very glad to support.

DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION NEGLIGENT.

Congress in the early part of 1915 authorized the construction of a dreadnaught, and I am informed by the Secretary of the Navy that the keel of the same has not yet been laid, although over one year has gone by. The Secretary gives as the reason that the department is waiting for later designs.

I believe in preparedness, and I believe that we should have it with dispatch. If we can not build our vessels in the Government navy yards, we ought to build them in private yards. The bill before us has a provision that if this country should enter into any arrangement with the powers of the world for disarmament this building program would not have to be carried out; and although the amount of money that it will cost is large, I believe that the taxation of munitions of war which are exported, as provided by the proposed revenue bill, will help quite largely in raising the amount.

Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for this bill, because I believe the people not only of the State that I have the honor to represent in part, but the people of the United States, are in favor of this preparedness. I also feel that if this building program is adopted and conditions change we can repeal it and not carry it out. But I believe that the exigencies of the present time warrant us in supporting the present building program. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. I yield the remainder of the time allotted to this side, five minutes, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I know that I am not hysterical by nature or easily carried off my feet by excitement. I think many Members of this House can testify to that. I do not think that I feel hysterical on the present situation or that the popular excitement has had anything whatever to do with the judgment which I have formed. I have been, like many others, an earnest reader of history, and have read how nations have grown, expanded, and fallen; how movements of civilization come and go. I never felt a greater responsibility of membership in this House than I do to-day with the world in a maelstrom of war, with a certainty that when the war is over the indebtedness of a few European nations will be a hundred billions of dollars, with an interest payment of more than $5,000,000,000 a year; with the certainty that we will have disputes about our rights in these countries abroad, with the knowledge that we will be the great Nation of wealth; it seems to me that ordinary wisdom requires us to look to the day ahead and to prepare now for what we hope may not come, but what may come notwithstanding our hope. Those who oppose preparedness are like those who never will repair their roofs in dry weather. We do not know what is coming—you and I can not tell. We have the responsibility to the whole Nation, and it is our duty to put our house in order, to be prepared to protect our rights at home; aye, and to assert them abroad. [Applause.]

I am a man of peace. I want to keep out of war. Every vote I have cast, every word I have uttered since the war began has been to prevent this country becoming involved in war, but we ought to have sense enough to make some preparation for what may come, for the war may come in spite of us.

This side of the House has a great responsibility. When the country needs the best thought it never gets it from the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] And now that we are determined to put patriotism above partisanship and protect our country it will devolve upon the Republican side of the House to cast the majority vote which will carry the program through. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, with the adoption of the conference report on the Navy bill we will have authorized the largest appropriation for the Navy ever made by any country not at war.

The proposed act carries $50,000,000 more than was ever authorized by the greatest naval power in the world—Great Britain. The problems of imperial Great Britain are not our problems. Sixty per cent of her food is imported. With a population of 46,000,000 souls England rules over one-fifth of the globe and over one-fourth of the globe's population. Her colonies are scattered on all seas and on all continents.

This Republic has pledged its honor to the world to emancipate the Philippine Islands, the only distant possession of the United States. The American people need no new colonies. The United States should not seek new "places in the sun."

For this fiscal year there will be a per capita tax of $6 for Army and Navy purposes. Every man, woman, and child will have to pay $6 a year to maintain the Army and Navy. The present per capita expenditure for education is only $4.56. It is the poor man, the man and the woman who works for a living, that pays all taxes, no matter who the nominal payer of the taxes may be.

As it is, the per capita annual expense for maintaining the Government is $22 per head. With the added military burden and with the generally growing expense of the Government the load will now average $30 per head, or $150 annually for a family of five. This $150 a year is more than one-fourth of the earnings of the great majority of the industrial and agricultural workers of the country.

What a tremendous price to pay for the privilege of being governed!

Congress is in session twice each year. Nevertheless this bill provides for a three-year construction program. There will be no way of correcting the error, no way of retracing the step. By the time Congress shall have met again contracts for the construction of ships involving an additional $500,000,000 will have been made.

What a surrender of the Treasury of the United States into the hands of the munitions manufacturers!

But it is not only the waste of the people's money that I complain of. Every capital ship, every dreadnaught, added to the American Navy will be an agent provocateur of war. It will be an invitation and a suggestion to neighbors near and remote to be on their guard, and to do likewise.

We must look below the surface for the real cause of this "preparedness" craze. The munitions manufacturers have contributed their share to the hysteria. The advocates of a world empire for the United States have stimulated this new faith in the "mailed fist." Politics was no mean factor. But the deeper reason for this madness lies in a carefully laid scheme by the ruling interests, by the industrial and financial magnates, by those who have appropriated the resources of this country, to check the rising tide of industrial democracy.

The million Socialist votes cast in 1912, the disruption of the Republican Party in the name of progressive thought, the revelations of the Commission on Industrial Relations showed that new forces were at work.

Men and women were studying, thinking, inquiring. The propaganda carried on with untold sacrifice by the Socialists was beginning to bear fruit. Louder and louder, more and more insistent, became the demand that the lot of the masses be improved. Trifling concessions here and there failed to satisfy the awakening intellect and the aroused conscience.

It is to divert the minds and the energies of the people from the contemplation of their grievances by fastening their eyes upon some invisible and nonexistent enemy that this program of force, this gospel of "preparedness," has become the overshadowing issue of the day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House some two months ago it was with some reluctance that I supported it, on account of the extreme length that it then went in the building program. On account of the fact that the Democratic members of the committee who had opposed a big Navy had been given assurance that that would be the last word in the building program, I did so. But when it went to the other body and got into the hands of the committee on conference, we found that those assurances that had been given, as I thought in good faith, seemed to have gone to the winds. Mr. Speaker, there will be a day of reckoning to Members who regard consistency so lightly. There will be parallel columns of their votes submitted against those who voted one way two months ago and will vote another way to-day. The honest people whom they represent will ask them to show the changed conditions which demand such sudden change of attitude in so brief a period. They will ask them to point out where there was any more danger of war two months ago than there is to-day. They will ask them why they shifted. Was it truckling subserviency and cowardice, or was it because they had changed their minds overnight?

There could be but one substantial argument that would cause me to support this outrageous bill, and that is to make me believe, like gentlemen on the other side of the House profess to believe, that there will be a Republican President, as they pretend to think there will be. [Applause on the Republican side.] Oh, yes; they say it, but at heart they do not believe it. I never saw a worse washed-out, despondent-looking crowd in my life than some of those who returned from the notification meeting of Mr. Hughes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, if I believed, further, as some of the papers predict, that Mr. Roosevelt will be the Secretary of State and Mr. Hughes the President, then I would think there would be danger of war and some force in the argument in favor of preparation for that calamity. Happily, however, we have had the leadership for the past three years, and I believe, in the providence of God and the will of the American people, we will have it for the next five years [applause on the Democratic side], of a man who has kept us out of war, and the same guiding hand, the same pilot, will steer the ship of state through peaceful waters during the next administration. Mr. Speaker, believing as I do, that conditions now are no more threatening to us than they were two months ago when the Democrats voted against this proposition, and that the impoverished nations on the other side, which the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just said will be involved in more than a hundred billion of dollars of debt at the end of the war, will be in worse condition than ever to seek war with us, and that no other nation, unless it be Japan, would desire war with us, and Japan without European allies would never dare attack us—believing so, I think there is no more necessity for this bill and its extravagant building program now than there was two months ago, and I decline to change my mind with all the facility and agility of a Christmas jumping jack from the position that I maintained at that time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Are we always to let an artificial hysteria, worked up and encouraged by those who fill their coffers by threats of war, drive us into somersaults that will make us ridiculous in the sight of our constituents at home? I am for adequate preparedness, both by land and by sea, but we are going wild on this question. Who wants to fight us? After the end of the European war every nation engaged in it will be bankrupt in men and money. War with a rich nation like ours, with 3,000 miles of ocean to be traversed to get to us, is simply unthinkable. Millions have been spent by the armor-plate and munition manufacturers to work up this craze, and now unsuspecting Democrats are walking into the net they have spread for us.

Why not put more of this money that we are wasting into building good roads, so that the man who pays the mud tax can see where some of it is going? Of course the Republicans are glad to vote for all these wild expenditures, because it gives them ground to taunt us for our extravagance, and a better reason to cry for a higher tariff. But surely we who are responsible for legislation ought to call a halt.

Two months ago the Republican members of the Naval Affairs Committee tried to force through a shipbuilding program that was not even as bad as this, but under the leadership of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. PADGETT] and the leader of the majority [Mr. KITCHIN] we defeated it. The chairman of the committee [Mr. PADGETT] denounced the Republican amendment as wasteful and unnecessary extravagance, and we followed him and defeated the amendment.

Now, two months later, with not a war cloud hanging over us, this same chairman urges us to even swallow a conference report that goes far beyond the Republican amendment. For one, I can not follow such shifting leadership.

Are we going headlong into a race for naval supremacy with all the other nations of the world? Have we forgotten that this spirit of rivalry for great military preponderance two years ago involved Europe in the bloodiest war that has disgraced the pages of the world's history?

The evidence before the Naval Affairs Committee shows that we are already in the second rank as to naval preparedness, and yet the Navy League and the jingoes are turning over heaven and earth to force Congress to build more warships and more instruments of human destruction and murder.

The Secretary of the Navy a little over a year ago said:

> The naval appropriations in our own country have doubled in a dozen years, and have gone up by leaps and bounds in other countries. If this mad rivalry in construction goes on, the burden will become too heavy for any nation to bear.

But, Mr. Speaker, the mere expense of construction is not all, for the maintenance and upkeep of each ship, the crew, and so forth, will be a million dollars a year.

Again, if we begin the rivalry with other nations, we will be forced to keep it up every time they build a ship, and the backs of my people will have to bear the burden.

Our naval expenditures for the last three years averaged $142,000,000, and for this year it leaps to the enormous sum of $316,000,000. This is an increase from the last year's appropriation of $166,000,000.

Yet we are told by those who know that we are not threatened from any quarter.

I can not follow the lead of the Republicans who have ever been the apostles of big appropriations. I am no time server, and, without some sane reason for doing so, I will not stultify myself by voting squarely against what I believed two months ago was right and what I am convinced is right now.

Within a few days' time Members have told me that they would not vote for this iniquity. In a few minutes we will see what kind of stability and courage they possess. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are certain basic truths that I can not lose sight of in the consideration of this naval program now pending. I am not much impressed with Members' opinions as to the particular type of ship that should be constructed, or whether we are in this place or in that place as compared to other countries; but I am impressed with this fact, that there is no nation on the globe that has the stake in the world that we the people of these United States have. I realize that our rôle is no minor one, that talk simply of being able to prevent invasion of our shores shows a complete failure to appreciate the duty and the obligation that rests upon a Government. This Nation is not a hermit nation; it can not live within itself. It does not endeavor to do it—why it can not have prosperity of the most ordinary kind without exporting one-third of its manufactured products, to say nothing of its great production in the way of foodstuffs and its great natural resources. If it is to export, it means that it must go into trade rivalries with other nations. It must be in contact with the world at large, and I for one want to see the rights of an American, at home or abroad, respected and preserved. I want the American flag on an American ship, to have full protection the world over. [Applause.] I hope to have those rights respected and held by peaceful methods, but I realize that however just may be our position that that alone will not always guarantee their recognition.

And if the need comes when we must fight for some fundamental right of the Nation or its citizens, I for one am not going to stop to argue whether that right is a right at home or a right abroad, but simply if it be a right. Believing that, I think this Nation needs to have an Army and a Navy commensurate with its size, and the rôle that it is to play in the world's drama. No man believes now that the program here submitted means the end of our naval program. If to-day the smaller proposition were accepted in place of the larger it would be supplemented next year and the year following. There is no harm in making the authorizations now, and if delay comes in the building of the ships, the delay at least can not be laid to the door of the legislative branch of the Government, for we will have provided the means, and I hope and believe the administrative officers will provide the ships that we ought to have. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, within the time allotted I will have the opportunity of giving only one or two of many reasons why I shall not support this motion to adopt the naval program contained in the Senate amendments. I do not hesitate to confess embarrassment as a Member of the House, and especially as a Democrat, to-day. I remember, two months ago, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Democratic membership of that committee, the Democratic membership of the House, and, as I understood it, the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of his department, and the administration persuaded and insisted upon the Democrats in the House to vigorously oppose and vote against what was then considered an extravagant, wild, and reckless program presented by the Republicans. Under such persuasion and insistence I got up in this House amid the applause of my fellow Democrats, led by the chairmen of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and denounced the Republican program presented in the minority report as criminal extravagance and recklessness.

I declared, and I was authorized by the report of the majority and the chairman's speech to make the declaration that such a program was not required by the needs of the Navy or the Government. I believe I said it was criminal for this House to vote upon a proposition that would take hundreds of millions of dollars needlessly out of the Treasury through the proposition presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. And yet in two short months the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Secretary of the Navy, and the President and most of my fellow Democrats want me to get up now on this floor and eat my words and say that the program of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Republicans, which they induced me then to denounce as criminal recklessness, is now the very perfection of virtue and patriotism. I wish here to corroborate what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has said. Both before and after the interview with the Secretary of the Navy, to which he referred, I conferred with him and Mr. HENSLEY and also with the chairman, Mr. PADGETT. I was given to understand—I was expressly told—that if we could get the Democratic members of the Naval Committee and the Democrats in the House together on a one-year $240,000,000 program the Secretary of the Navy and the administration would get behind it and make it the administration program. Though this was many millions larger than many of us favored, I went to work to get my colleagues together on this. The chairman and I worked together. All got together and the one-year $240,000,000 program was reported out by the Democratic solid vote on the committee. The chairman stated on the floor of the House that the Navy Department and the Secretary of the Navy approved it enthusiastically. But this program is gone, and here comes the Butler program to take its place. The first year of the program is enough like the one-year program of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] and his colleagues to be twins. The three-year program—and Mr. BUTLER and his colleagues demanded in the committee a three-year program—out-Republicans the Republican program by over $75,000,000. I denounced, with the approval of the Navy Department and Chairman PADGETT and my colleagues, the program of the Republicans as criminal extravagance and waste, and now, gentlemen, upon my honor as a man and a Member of this House I can not see more virtue in it, because forsooth within two months to-day, it has Democratic sanction—from the President down. If such a program was wrong and reckless and extravagant then, it is wrong and reckless and extravagant now, and more so because since then the two great naval powers of Europe have lost 100,000 tonnage each of war ships, and to-day the navy of Germany and of all other nations except Great Britain is far below the strength of the United States Navy, considering ships built, building, and authorized, and we stand to-day far in the front as the second naval power of the world.

That is the rank which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which the Republicans in their report, which the administration, and which the war traffickers through their patriotic organization, the Navy League, asked us to put this Nation in—the second rank. We are in the second rank, and every man who has taken the time to investigate knows it. The evidence last session before the Naval Committee showed we were then in the second rank. The Secretary of the Navy himself then declared solemnly that the Navy of the United States was stronger and superior to any navy on earth except that of Great Britain. The naval officers who appeared before the committee testified to that, the minority leader agreed to that upon the floor of the House. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Democrats, the real intelligent, patriotic Republicans, every one admitted on this floor we were then second. And since this proof and admissions we authorized last session a naval program the largest in the history of the Government, and since then Germany, whose navy was superior to that of any European power except Great Britain, lost 200,000 tonnage in warships, and since the war began has lost 400,000 tonnage, more than she can build, more than we can build in three or five years. If our Navy was superior to that of Germany last session, a year and a half ago, as was testified by the Secretary of the Navy and the naval officers and admitted on this floor, how much more superior and stronger is it now, with our biggest authorization of ship construction and Germany's tremendous losses since then? I want to call the attention of the House and the country to the enormity of this proposed program which we are asked to adopt to-day. Some of us Democrats who refuse to gulp it down will be called, as we have already been, traitors to the administration and to the party.

But we propose to be loyal to ourselves, loyal to our consciences and convictions.

The large and growing expenditures for our Navy before the munition makers and jingoes had caused the preparedness hysteria to seize Congress and the Executive, had aroused the people of the country into asking, "Where shall it end?" Secretary Daniels, in his report to the last session of Congress, December, 1914, said (and he was but substantially repeating what had been said in the British Parliament, the German Reichstag, the French Assembly, and by prominent statesmen the world over relative to the armament expenditures of their respective countries for the last several years):

> The naval appropriations in our own country have doubled in a dozen years and have gone up by leaps and bounds in other countries. If this mad rivalry in construction goes on, the burden will become too heavy for any nation to bear.

In his report of December, 1913, he says:

> The growing cost of dreadnaughts, of powder, and of everything that makes an efficient navy gives reason to pause. The heavy expense commands national and international consideration. Ten years ago our largest battleships cost $5,288,000. The next dreadnaught will cost $14,044,000.

The dreadnaughts hereafter to be built will cost $20,000,000. In an interview the Secretary says all ship materials and munitions of war have gone up over 30 per cent. He asks:

> When is this accelerating expenditure to be reduced? * * * If it is not hastened by appeals for the peaceful settlement of national differences, the day is not far distant when the growing burdens of taxation for excessive war and naval expenditures will call a halt.

Before exposing to full view the enormity and insanity of this program, which will soon be written into the statutes, I ask that you carry in your mind these facts: When the European war began the United States was then expending on its Navy $30,000,000 more than Germany or any other nation, except England, was expending on its navy. For the 10 years preceding the war we had expended on our Navy $317,000,000 more than Germany, $463,000,000 more than France, $518,000,000 more than Russia, $852,000,000 more than Italy, and $827,000,000 more than Japan had expended on its navy.

For these 10 years—

> Germany expended on its navy, $904,332,000.
> France expended on its navy, $759,014,000.
> Russia expended on its navy, $703,365,000.
> Italy expended on its navy, $369,876,000.
> Japan expended on its navy, $394,485,000.

But the United States expended on its Navy the huge sum of $1,222,000,000.

We increased in the five years preceding the war our annual naval expenditures three times as much as Germany increased hers. Our total expenditures for the Navy in 1910 was $111,791,000, and in 1914 $141,872,000, while Germany's naval expenditure in 1910 was $103,302,000, and in 1914 $113,993,000. Last year—1915-16—our naval appropriation was $150,000,000.

Now, in the face of the truth and the warning of the Secretary of the Navy, just quoted; in the face of the fact that we have a Navy superior to that of Germany or any other nation, except Great Britain; in face of the fact that our Navy is growing bigger and stronger and better equipped than ever before; in face of the fact, as the President, both in messages to Congress and in public addresses, has repeatedly declared, "We are threatened from no quarter"; in face of the fact that we are in less danger from a foreign foe than ever before, and even were one so inclined, he is less able to strike or harm us than ever before; in face of the fact that prior to the European war we were expending on our Navy $30,000,000 more than Germany or any other nation, except Great Britain, was expending on its navy and for the 10 years preceding the war we had expended over $300,000,000 more than Germany or any other nation, except Great Britain, had expended on its navy, this program, for which we are asked by the administration and the chairman of the Naval Committee to vote—at one bound—one year—increases our already immensely large naval appropriations twice as much as our total increase for the last 15 years; more than three times as much as the total increase by Great Britain in the 3 years prior to the European war; more than two and a half times as much as the total increase by Germany in the 10 years preceding the war and more than six times her total increase in the 5 years prior to the war; and $60,000,000 more than the total increase of all the nations in the world combined in any one year in all history, prior to the war. And in one year. And yet they say that we are sane and conservative in our "preparedness" program.

The three-year provision of the program requires an increase of appropriations over 7 times more than the total increase by Great Britain in the 10 years prior to the European war, 10 times more than the total increase by Germany or any other nation, except Great Britain, in the 10 years preceding the war, 60 times more than the total increase by Germany in the 5 years preceding the war, and 100 times more than the total increase by Germany in the 3 years preceding the war. And do not forget that when the war began we were expending $30,000,000 annually more than Germany.

But this is not all.

This three-year program increases our naval appropriations over $200,000,000, more than the combined increase of all the nations in the world for the entire 10 years preceding the European war, and over $350,000,000 or more than twice as much as the total increase of all the nations in the world for the 5 years prior to the war. Our increase alone provided in this measure for this year is over $50,000,000 more than the largest total appropriation for any year by Germany in all her history.

Still they insist that we are sane and conservative.

Our total appropriation for this year is more than two and a half times larger than the total appropriations by Germany, France, or any other nation, except Great Britain, in any year in its history, and $50,000,000 larger than any annual appropriation by Great Britain prior to the war; and $60,000,000 larger than the total appropriations by Germany, Japan, Italy, and Austria combined in any one year of their history.

Our appropriations required by the three-year program will be as large as the total appropriations of Germany, France, Russia, Italy, and Japan for the three years prior to the war.

For the last three years our total naval expenditures in round numbers amounted to $428,000,000, an average per year of $142,600,000. But under this program for this fiscal year it amounts to $316,000,000. Last year the appropriation was $150,000,000, an increase alone in this year of $166,000,000, and the three-year program will require not less than a total appropriation of $1,100,000,000, or an increase over the last three years of nearly $700,000,000.

I wish I had time to go further into details as to the enormity of this outrageous, insane program. I shall append to my remarks a table of naval expenditures by the nations of the world from 1900 to 1914, inclusive, filed by the Navy Department at the hearings this session before the Naval Committee. A study and investigation of this table will sustain the statements I have made.

When once this program goes on the statute books, which it will in a few days, unless there is a political revolution in both parties, naval appropriations will never be reduced, but, on the contrary, will be increased from year to year. Next year's appropriations and the following years each under this program will be over $100,000,000 more than the fabulous amount of this year's appropriations. When this measure becomes law, thereby putting the arms of the munition makers into the Treasury to the elbows, with their heretofore undreamed-of profits at stake, we can hardly conceive of a power in the Nation strong enough to extract them. I fear that the big interests behind this program, with their tremendous and irresistible influence and their infinite ingenuity, will find or make a way to persuade or force the controlling factors in both parties to make perpetual the surrender to them of the Federal Treasury and to place permanently at their mercy the taxpayers of the country. The three-year provision in the program is nothing more nor less than an outrage upon the taxpayers—an outrage as pleasing and beneficial to big finance interested in munition making and shipbuilding as if they themselves had personally committed it. It guarantees to them for three years the full benefit of the abnormally high prices for ships and munitions caused by the present war. That provision, in addition to the tremendous profits even at normal prices, which the program would give, is worth to them at least an extra $100,000,000. Of course, the program must be a "three-year continuing one." And Congress votes it! And the Secretary of the Navy approves! And the President will sign! And then for the greatest orgy of graft and plunder and profits on the part of ingenious, despotic, coercive, organized avarice the world ever witnessed!

With the three-years provision in, the big interests would only have to control either the Executive, Senate, or the House—either one could prevent its repeal or modification in a future Congress, and the people, to release their grip on the Treasury and the taxpayers, would have to get all three—the House, the Senate, and the Executive.

With the three-years provision out and the naval program left to the wisdom and judgment of each Congress each annual session, as has been done since the beginning of the Government, the big interests would have to control all—the Executive, the Senate, and the House—to enforce their schemes, and the people only one—either the House, the Senate, or the Executive—to prevent their raids on the Treasury and their plundering of the taxpayers for more than this one year.

The three-year provision went in and will remain in. Every doubt, every possibility, has been resolved by this program in favor of the shipbuilders and munition makers—the Morgans, the Fricks, the Dodges, the Bacons, the Schwabs, the Perkins, the Thompsons, and so forth. The war trafficker's press already announces with most flattering commendation that the Secretary of the Navy will be ready, almost immediately after the bill becomes law, to ask for bids and award contracts to carry out the program, and so forth. They will have him to hurry, not that the countrty is in any danger of a foreign foe, but that the shipbuilders and munition makers will be in danger of losing their high war prices if the Secretary should delay until the end of the European war gets in sight. The people will find out sooner or later that it is profit to the contractors, not danger t the country, that has been one of the great incentives and inspirations to the speed and size of the program.

Let me impress upon the membership of this House, Republicans and Democrats, and upon the intelligence and patriotism of this country, that when this measure passes and the President signs it this Nation will be in dollars and cents the greatest military-naval Nation the world has ever seen. Our appropriations for the Army and Navy will be $100,000,000 more than the appropriation for the army and navy of any nation on earth prior to the European war. Neither Russia with her immense militarism, nor Germany with her vast militarism and navalism, nor Great Britain with her huge navalism, ever expended in any one year in all their history on their armies and navies as much by $100,000,000 as our Army and Navy program hereafter annually demands. And they say we are sane and conservative and patriotic!

Gentlemen, another thing: The amount of annual appropriation for the next and following years for this hysterical preparedness, Army bill, fortification bill, naval bill, will be larger by over $150,000,000 than the fabulous appropriation for which we have and are now legislating, and will be more by over $50,000,000 than the total amount of taxes ever collected from all sources in the history of this Government. The amount of appropriations for this current fiscal year in the Army and fortification acts and in the naval bill now pending, including the $29,000,000 for the Army in the recent appropriation act, totals in round numbers $640,000,000.

In 1915 we collected only $625,000,000 from tariff, from income, from liquor, from tobacco, from all special taxes, and from the emergency revenue act of October, 1914, and yet these appropriations this session for preparedness require $640,000,000, $15,000,000 more than the total amount of taxes we raised from every source in 1915. But for the next and succeeding years this preparedness program will demand annually at least $775,000,000, $50,000,000 more than was ever raised from all sources of taxation in any year in the history of the Government!

In 1912 we collected from all sources of taxation $632,000,000.
In 1913 we collected from all sources of taxation $663,000,000.
In 1914 we collected from all sources of taxation $672,000,000.
In 1915 we collected from all sources of taxation $625,456,000.
In 1916 we collected from all sources of taxation $724,000,000.

In the collection of 1915 we had the help of the emergency act of October, 1914, to the amount of $52,000,000, and in the collection of 1916 it helped to the amount of $84,000,000.

In the next fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1917, and the following years our Army and Navy and fortification bills will reach from $750,000,000 to $800,000,000 if the courage of the next Congress or the good sense and resolution of the people do not force a modification of the present program.

But if the program, for which both parties are responsible, is to be carried out, the big revenue bill now pending before Congress will not raise half enough money to meet the annual preparedness appropriations for 1918 and 1919 and the succeeding years; and within two years another revenue bill twice as big as the pending one will have to be enacted, whether Congress is Democratic or Republican.

I warn the taxpayers of the country. My time has expired. I regret that I have not the time to discuss the big, overreaching objection to this program. I shall have to be content with saying that, in my judgment, when order is restored in Europe it will be a fresh menace to the peace and humanity of the world. It condemns our pretentions to international arbitration, and a world peace as hypocrisy and mockery. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, moving that the House agree to the Senate amendments, I feel that I am discharging a wise and a patriotic duty and service. In view of the statement that was made early in the debate, I wish to state here that I have been in close touch in conference with the President of the United States, and his whole heart is in this matter, and ever since last September he has advocated a continuous program and has advocated a program that would meet the will and the wishes of the American people. I want to say here, notwithstanding the strictures and criticisms——

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PADGETT. Notwithstanding the strictures and criticisms, the President of the United States has put the power and the force of his great prestige into the support of this program. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he stands for it to-day and asks that the Congress of the United States, without reference to partizanship, but as a patriotic duty, carry out this program.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House in the argument of the details. I have not the time, so that I leave it as it is, asking the House to vote without regard to politics, without regard to partizanship, but with a patriotic purpose to sustain this program. And I simply say, in conclusion, that both parties in their platforms adopted in June last declared for a continuing and a continuous program. Both parties are committed to a program for more than one year, and this is redeeming the pledge that was made to the people.

Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question upon Senate amendment 238.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is not all debate exhausted on the three amendments?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of having the previous question?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not want to have any division.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move the previous question upon all three of the amendments?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; on all three of them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on amendments numbered 80, 83, and 238.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken on Senate amendment 238.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I think it is the wish of the House that there shall be a roll call on that amendment. I ask for a roll call on amendment 238.

The SPEAKER. Amendment numbered 238 is the building program. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment 238 and agree to the same. Those in favor of that motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that Senate amendments numbered 80 and 83 be voted on together, as they are on kindred subjects. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendments 80 and 83, the personnel amendments, and agreeing to the same.

The motion to recede and concur was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. I move that the House still further insist on its disagreement to the remaining amendments, and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the remaining amendments, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 54.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 15947) entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to omit the word "not," in line 17 of paragraph 20 of the matter inserted by the conference under Senate amendment numbered 89.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the several votes this day taken in reference to the naval appropriation bill was laid on the table.

FLOODS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 298.

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation of $540,000 made by the joint resolution approved August 3, 1916, for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee, and Mississippi is made available for the same purpose and to the same extent of relief for flood sufferers in the State of West Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, do I understand by this phraseology that there is appropriated for this purpose the same amount? The wording is to appropriate the same amount for the flood sufferers in West Virginia.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the resolution simply includes West Virginia as one of the States where relief can be had and would not appropriate any additional money at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The phraseology is rather ambiguous.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was carefully drawn in the Committee on Appropriations and does not appropriate additional money.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I rose, reserving the right to object, to find if by this resolution the sum of money now available to the State of South Carolina would be reduced.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is my understanding that there is ample money to take care of the situation in all of these States; that instead of appropriating an additional sum we simply by this resolution include the State of West Virginia. The Committee on Appropriations has had considerable experience, and there has never been an instance in which the amount appropriated has been inadequate, but there always has been a surplus that has not been expended but has gone back into the Treasury. I can assure the gentleman that the passage of this resolution is not going to interfere with any proper relief work in South Carolina.

Mr. BLACKMON. The passage of this resolution will not delay South Carolina, Georgia, or Alabama in their work?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not a particle; it will not interfere with those things at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed, and go back to the amending stage and amend the House amendment already agreed to, by striking out certain things.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to cancel the proceedings by which the bill passed the House back to the amending stage. Is there objection?

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 16, 1916.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy guidance and blessing for this new day in the discharge of the duties that we dare not undertake of our own strength or of our own wisdom. Having so much of the interests of so many of Thy children in our keeping in such large measure, we come to Thee whose law is just and right and good and ask for Thy guidance and blessing this day. Give us a responsive heart to every approach of God to us. Give to us the consciousness of the larger unity of interests that we have. As we are sure there are no conflicting duties, so there are no conflicting interests to those who learn to like Thy way in the light of God's revealed truth. Help us to-day in the interest of all the people to think and act, and may Thy name be glorified by the service which we render. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who is detained by illness.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. KENYON]. This will stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise again to announce the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] owing to illness. I will ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. FLETCHER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to prefer a request for unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida presents a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. to-day, August 16, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the committee amendments to the bill H. R. 15455, the shipping bill, in regular order as printed in the bill; then upon any amendment that may be offered by or on behalf of the committee; then upon any amendment that may be offered; and then, without further debate, upon the bill itself through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on the said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto: Provided, That a Senator proposing an amendment may speak for a period not exceeding 10 minutes in its explanation and favor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I did not catch the date that has been suggested for voting on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To-day.

Mr. FLETCHER. At 4 o'clock to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. I think it had better go over until a little later in the day. A number of Senators are absent from the Chamber who might want to be consulted about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have been assured we could reach a vote on this bill soon after the revenue bill was reported, and that bill is now ready to be reported. I am told that it will be reported this morning. So I was in hopes that we could reach a vote on the shipping bill this afternoon.

Mr. PENROSE. Without having the slightest desire to delay a vote on the shipping bill I suggest to the Senator that he hold it for half an hour and then bring it up.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well; that will be satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5425) to standardize lime barrels.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution providing that in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 15947) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, the Clerk be authorized and directed to omit the word "not," in line 17 of paragraph 20 of the matter inserted by the conference in Senate amendment No. 89, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15947) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes; recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 80, 83, and 238 to the bill and agrees to the same; insists upon its disagreement to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the bill still in disagreement, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. ESTOPINAL, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts, managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13984) granting to the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, a right of way through the United States military reservation at Fort Mifflin, Pa.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 6372. An act to authorize the counties of Baldwin and Mobile, Ala., their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Spanish River at or near the junction of Raft and Spanish Rivers;

H. R. 11129. An act for the relief of the owners of the barkentine Mabel I. Meyers and her master and crew, and for the relief of the owners of cargo of molasses late on board said barkentine; and

H. R. 12712. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes."

Mr. WARREN. I present a number of telegrams from bankers in my State protesting against the retention in the revenue bill of the special bankers' tax. The telegrams are short, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., August 12, 1916.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I understand there is possibility of reinstating in revenue bill special bankers' tax. We are very much opposed to this tax, considering it a discrimination against our business and unjust in every way, and trust you will use your influence to defeat any move to reinstate it.

LANDER STATE BANK.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., August 11, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

Would you give more than your usual careful attention to the explosives' clause in the munitions bill now before the Senate committee, primarily because retroactive, and tax seems to be excessive upon the industry which is the most important unit of industrial preparedness and one which the Government should foster. It is particularly severe upon California explosive companies, as this is the second State in explosives manufacturing, and right here in California explosives manufacturing should be most encouraged.

J. N. GILLETT.

DENVER, COLO., August 11, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

The organization which I represent, composed of 12,000 growers, shippers, and distributors of fruits and vegetables living in central, middle, and far western country, earnestly but vigorously protest against amending H. R. 16763, to keep in effect stamp tax on freight and express bills of lading, telephone and telegraph messages, perishable industry carried on by long-distance phone, and telegrams. Shipments of freight and express are of small money value, but millions of them. Stamp tax falls heavily and unevenly upon this industry. Willing to pay our share to support our Government, but stamp tax an unjust burden.

W. D. TIDWELL, Secretary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the adoption of a proposed amendment to the revenue bill providing for the suspension of drawback payments until six months after the restoration of peace in Europe, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OLIVER presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to establish a United States shipping board, which was ordered to lie on the table.

SURVEY OF PECOS RIVER, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6823) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make further survey of the Pecos River and Valley in Texas and New Mexico to determine the feasibility and cost of an irrigation project thereon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 797) thereon.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance I report back to the Senate the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, with certain amendments, and with the suggested amendments the committee recommend that the bill do pass, and I submit a report (No. 793) thereon. I have not quite completed the statement which usually accompanies such a report, but I will complete it during the day and file it so that it may be printed together with the bill and appear on the desks of Senators to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the request the Senator made?

Mr. SIMMONS. I made no request. I simply stated that I have not yet quite finished the statement that usually accompanies such a report, but that I would finish it during the day and file it during the day that it may be printed along with the bill and appear on the desks of Senators to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator to also request that there be made a print of the bill as reported in parallel columns with the present revenue law as it affects the items in the bill, so that Senators may have the present law and the bill itself before them. (S. Doc. No. 531.)

Mr. SIMMONS. I make that request.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how early in the day he expects to file the report?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated a minute ago I would file it during the day.

Mr. PENROSE. Does that mean at a late hour to-day or some time soon?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am reporting the bill now with a formal report recommending that it be passed, but I stated that the written statement which usually accompanies such a bill has not been finished; but I will finish it during the day and file it so that it can be printed along with the bill in the morning.

Mr. PENROSE. The reason I ask the question of the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. President, is that the minority have their report ready; but, of course, they do not want to make it until the majority have presented their report to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. The minority may file their report right now. I assure the minority that I shall present the formal majority report during the day.

Mr. PENROSE. We want to know, so that our report will not be filed before that of the majority.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither report will be printed until to-morrow morning, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I ask that 5,000 additional copies of the bill as reported be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SCHOOL LAND AT WADSWORTH, NEV.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 6840) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey title to certain lands in the State of Nevada, and I submit a report (No. 794) thereon. I intend to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It provides for conveying title to the county commissioners of Washoe County, Nev., to 10 lots upon which the schoolhouse is built in the town of Wadsworth, Nev. The schoolhouse has been built there for a number of years and has been used during all that time by the school district. The town as originally laid out as a town site was made——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is so much confusion in the Chamber I have not heard a word he has said or what his request is. Will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. PITTMAN. I was trying to explain why I intend to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. In the town of Wadsworth, Nev., there is a schoolhouse that has been used for a great many years. It is situated on 10 town lots fenced in. It seems that while it is in the surveyed town of Wadsworth, which is a town site 30 or 40 years old, the survey has gone just outside of the original town site. It is in the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation. In fact, the whole town of Wadsworth was included in the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation. This town is on the Southern Pacific Railroad. They have discovered that it was Indian land, although it has been used for many years, and they have built a schoolhouse on it and kept up the school. The bill is simply to convey title or confirm title to the lots upon which the school building is situated.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if there is a report from the department on the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a letter from the department on it. The matter was called to the attention of the department four or five weeks ago. The bill was sent to the department with a letter for information. In the letter that they wrote back they state that they do not know whether it is in the surveyed town site as originally laid out or outside of the surveyed town site, and they are attempting to ascertain; that they have no objection to the bill if it is as represented; that they are powerless to remedy the conditions themselves; and that legislation would be required. That is the purport of the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the department has no objection to the passage of the bill provided the conditions are as stated by the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to execute and deliver to the board of county commissioners of Washoe County, State of Nevada, United States patent conveying title to lots 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, and 47 in block 2 in the town of Wadsworth, situated upon the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation, in Washoe County, State of Nevada, for the use and benefit of the public schools.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HALVOR NILSEN.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 11860) for the relief of Halvor Nilsen, and I submit a report (No. 795) thereon. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the report.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Its purpose is to allow a homesteader to prove up a homestead of 40 acres, and to overcome certain technical objections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to Halvor Nilsen, of Wabanica, Minn., for the northwest quarter of northwest quarter section 24, township 161 north, range 32 west, fifth principal meridian, Minnesota, regardless of the fact that he commuted a former homestead entry under the provisions of section 2301, Revised Statutes, subsequently to the date of the act of June 5, 1900 (31 Stat., p. 267); but he shall make satisfactory proof of his compliance with the homestead law and pay any amounts due under the entry for the land described.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STANDARDS FOR CLIMAX BASKETS.

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17058) to fix standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables, and to fix standards for baskets and other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 796) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. I will say, by way of very brief explanation, that the bill seeks to standardize all containers in which fruits, principally grapes, are shipped in interstate commerce. The particular container referred to in the bill, which by its terms is to be standardized, is known as the "Climax basket." I am informed that the fruit growers are particularly interested in this legislation in order to prevent unjust discrimination in the matter of sales and weights.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the bill be reported.

Mr. JONES. Before the bill is passed I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from New York. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I desire to ask the Senator as to whether or not he has considered the terms of the bill in relation to the manufacture of containers in foreign countries, their being brought into the United States, and here used, when they do not comply with these requirements? I think the Senator from New York will find that there is nothing in this bill which prohibits the manufacture in another country of containers entirely different from the standards fixed in the bill. I desire to ask, Would this legislation prevent such containers from being used in a State in this country? I wish to call the Senator's attention to that. I had overlooked it until the title of the bill had been read, but I suppose the Senator has observed that feature of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it may be, as the Senator from Washington suggests, that a loophole may be found in this proposed law, through the importation of such baskets manufactured beyond the boundaries of the United States. In any event, I think that contingency is very improbable, as the manufacture of baskets is so closely allied with the fruit trade itself that their manufacture at a great distance and shipment into the United States is highly improbable for the purpose merely of evading this statute; but if it should turn out that such a loophole exists I think it can be easily remedied by subsequent legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 6866) granting a pension to Fred D. Abbott (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 6867) for the relief of Lena Garagnon; and

A bill (S. 6868) for the relief of Ethel Fredrickson and daughter Ethel; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 6869) granting an increase of pension to Daisy S. Phillips; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 6870) authorizing the Secretary of War to make a donation of condemned cannon and cannon balls; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LIPPITT:

A bill (S. 6871) granting an increase of pension to John Cook; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill, which I wish to tender later as an amendment to the revenue bill, and ask to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 6865) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to what is known as the bill of lading bill, being Senate bill No. 19; a conference was asked for, and conferees on the part of the Senate were appointed. This morning I have information which simply confirms the view I entertained and stated on yesterday, that if there is to be any final legislation upon this subject the Senate will be obliged to accept the amendments made to the bill by the other House. In order that this matter may be again brought before the Senate for further action, I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House, requested a conference with the House, and appointed conferees on the part of the Senate, and that the House be requested to return the message to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, only a moment. I have just read a letter written by Chairman ADAMSON, of the House of Representatives, in relation to this proposed legislation. Evidently from this letter Mr. ADAMSON, as chairman of the committee, has made up his mind that there shall be no changes in the amendments which have been made by the other House. That being the case, and it being evident to everybody that the legislation ought to pass, even if it has to pass with the amendments made by the House of Representatives, in order that that may be done, the action asked for by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] must be taken if the legislation is to pass at this session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will request the House of Representatives to return the message to the Senate.

MANEUVER CAMPS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a few days ago I referred to a resolution, which the Senate passed some months ago, calling upon the War Department for certain information. Subsequently I stated that I had ascertained that a report had been submitted, and I asked that it be printed, and stated that I had done an injustice to the department. The report having been received and having been referred to the appropriate committee, it was thought unnecessary to make a request for its printing and further reference. So it was understood that my request would be withdrawn, and all of my remarks were eliminated from the RECORD. I simply want to state, in justice to the War Department, that the report was promptly sent to the Senate, and that when I suggested that it had not been received I did them an injustice.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CIVIL-SERVICE REQUIREMENTS.

Mr PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to call up two resolutions submitted by me a few days ago and which are now on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How much time will the resolutions require?

Mr. PENROSE. There can be no objection to them, as I understand. I have a right to call them up. They are on the table, and their consideration ought not to take any time.

Mr. GALLINGER. The resolution went over under the rule.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; they went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator refer to Senate resolution 246?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not recall the numbers of the resolutions, but one calls for information from the Civil Service Commission and the other for information from the State Department.

Mr. POMERENE. On yesterday I gave notice of an amendment that I would offer to the resolution directed to the Civil Service Commission. I do not believe the Senator will have any objection to the proposed amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. No; I shall be glad to accept it in all probability, but I should like to have it read.

Mr. POMERENE. The resolution, as I understand, is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, there being no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the amendment which I offer be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution first be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 246) submitted by Mr. PENROSE on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Civil Service Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to send to the Senate a list of the Executive orders issued since March 4, 1913, exempting appointees in the Federal service from civil-service requirements, or placing under the civil service employees previously appointed outside of any eligible list furnished by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to make a technical correction. I ask that the word "requested" be stricken out and the word "directed" be inserted, as is customary. Now, does the amendment of the Senator from Ohio refer to the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. POMERENE. It refers to that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the following:

Also a similar list of the Executive orders issued during each administration prior thereto, beginning with the first administration of President Cleveland, exempting appointees in the Federal service from civil-service requirements, or placing employees under the civil service previously appointed outside of any eligible list prescribed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Ohio contemplate in the amendment only a reference to the State Department or to all departments?

Mr. POMERENE. The amendment relates to the first resolution submitted by the Senator several days ago which calls upon the Civil Service Commission for certain information.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, I suggest that the resolution calling upon the State Department be acted upon first; and then we can take up the second resolution which refers to the Civil Service Commission. There were two resolutions offered by me.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understood, Senate resolution 246 was offered first by the Senator from Pennsylvania and is now before the Senate, and my amendment is intended to be offered to that resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. As I understood, the resolution read was the one calling for certain information from the State Department. That resolution can be passed, and then we can take up the other for consideration.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Then we will take up Senate resolution 246.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate resolution 246, calling upon the Civil Service Commission for certain information, has just been read. The other resolution is Senate resolution 247.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understood, Senate resolution 246 was read.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I was mistaken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], as I understand, has an amendment to offer.

Mr JONES. I offer an amendment, to add to the resolution the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add:

Also the number of Executive orders issued during each administration under Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson with the concurrence of the Civil Service Commission and the number issued without the approval of the Civil Service Commission, and also those issued during each of said administrations without having been referred to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Washington a question, why may not that apply to each administration since and including the first Cleveland administration?

Mr. JONES. I would make no objection to that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. POMERENE. If the amendment can be so modified, I certainly have no objection to it.

Mr. JONES. How far back does the Senator desire to go?

Mr. POMERENE. Including the first Cleveland administration.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment be amended so as to cover the administration from and including the first Cleveland administration down to date.

Mr. POMERENE. Each administration including the first Cleveland administration.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator want also to include the Harrison administration and the second Cleveland administration?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. That is what I intended by the amendment proposed by me—each administration since the first Cleveland administration, and including that.

Mr. JONES. That will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no objection to those suggestions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add after the amendment just agreed to the following:

Also the number of Executive orders issued during each administration beginning with the first administration of President Cleveland, to and including the administration of President Wilson, with the concurrence of the commission and the number issued without the approval of the commission, and those issued during each of said administrations without having been referred to the commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Civil Service Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to send to the Senate a list of the Executive orders issued since March 4, 1913, exempting appointees in the Federal service from civil-service requirements, or placing under the civil-service employees previously appointed outside of any eligible list furnished by the Civil Service Commission; also a similar list of the Executive orders issued during each administration prior thereto, beginning with the first administration of President Cleveland, exempting appointees in the Federal service from civil-service requirements, or placing employees under the civil service previously appointed outside of any eligible list prescribed by the Civil Service Commission; also the number of Executive orders issued during each administration beginning with the first administration of President Cleveland to and including the administration of President Wilson, with the concurrence of the commission and the number issued without the approval of the commission, and those issued during each of said administrations without having been referred to the commission.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PENROSE. I now call up Senate resolution 247, submitted by me a few days ago, and ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate as follows:

First. The number of employees who have been appointed to positions in the State Department since July 1, 1913.

Second. What increase in the force of employees in the State Department has been made since July 1, 1913.

Third. The number of employees appointed since July 1, 1913, from eligible lists upon certification by the United States Civil Service Commission.

Fourth. The number of employees appointed temporarily without any civil-service examination or certification by the Civil Service Commission, and who subsequently were covered into the civil service under an Executive order dated May 18, 1916, being Executive Order No. 2383.

COST OF PRINT PAPER.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and think we can dispose of it in a few moments.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to submit an amendment to the revenue bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the increase in the cost of paper of all kinds has been in a most inordinate degree, and, as I believe, without warrant or justification. Paper in its manifold uses is a vital necessity to our civilization. I beg to say that the Paper Trust is the most unconscionable combination in our country. It is squeezing the very life out of the small papers of the country, and many of the large papers have been obliged to curtail their size. With a view to correcting the evil, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the revenue bill, by adding a new section to the free list, reading:

News print paper and materials entering into its making.

I ask that the amendment lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, which I submitted a few days ago, and I ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 54) of the House of Representatives, which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 15947) entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to omit the word "not," in line 17 of paragraph 20 of the matter inserted by the conference under Senate amendment No. 89.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask that the Senate concur in the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15947) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 80, 83, and 238, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how many amendments are still in disagreement?

Mr. SWANSON. Only a very few; only five or six.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The personnel and the construction programs have both been agreed to, have they not?

Mr. SWANSON. The House agreed to those items on yesterday. The other items are small matters that, I think, we can dispose of in a short time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PENROSE conferees on the part of the Senate.

MIKE G. WOMACK.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3533) for the relief of Mike G. Womack, which was, in line 6, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$657.30."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to,

THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Philippine government bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 381) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to delay a vote upon this measure by any extended discussion.

I voted to give the Philippine people their independence. I have experienced no change of view with reference to the wisdom of that vote. Of course it is neither necessary nor perhaps justifiable at this time to enter into a discussion of the reasons why I think the measure as it left the Senate should have been enacted into law. But, Mr. President, while I have had no change of view with respect to the wisdom of that vote, I have learned something with reference to the Philippine policy and the views of the people of the United States since that measure was before the Senate. I have become thoroughly convinced that the American people as a people, regardless of party and party pledges, are in favor of holding the Philippine Islands. While I regret to know this fact and should, notwithstanding it, if I were permitted to do so, vote again for their independence, yet I have no doubt of the fact.

After this vote was taken in the Senate upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and after the measure had passed this body, there was a very full expression of view with reference to the entire question by the American press, and I made it my business to gather as accurately as I could the view of the leading newspapers of the United States with reference to our future policy concerning the Philippines; and regardless of party or party affiliations upon the part of the press, it was almost wholly in favor of keeping the Philippine Islands permanently. I was not surprised at the Republican press, but I was, I must confess, surprised at the almost unanimous view of the Democratic press.

It seems presumptuous for one to reassert his view in the face of such public opinion. Nevertheless I believe that it would have been better for this Government, better for our people and our Nation, to have adopted a different policy. But what I rise to do now is to impress upon the Filipino people the lesson which I gathered, and that they should adjust themselves to the fact that they are a part of the United States and are to remain so permanently. I think it almost as unfortunate as to keep the islands for the United States to be engaged in an uncertain policy and occupying an uncertain attitude toward this question and toward these people. I think it unwise to hold out a hope to them which it seems wholly impossible they shall ever realize. I believe it better, far better, in view of this settled policy, to say to these people that they are now to come into a different relationship with us and assume a different attitude of mind.

It seems to me, as I read the public opinion of this country as it was drawn forth and expressed by reason of the action upon the part of the Senate, that we may conclude, and the people of the Philippines should conclude, that this question has been practically settled for all time to come; and unless it should transpire that the fortunes of war should change the policy, the Filipino people should adjust themselves to a situation which, in my judgment, has become permanent.

Mr. President, there is another piece of history from which we may draw a lesson and a moral. In 1900 the party which is now in power declared in so many terms, and in language unmistakable in its import, for the immediate independence of the Philippines and the Filipino people. Sixteen years have passed; the party is in power, and in contrast with the policy which was announced by the party we have the preamble to this bill:

> Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence: Therefore—

And so forth.

If the Filipino people will compare the declarations made by the party now in power in 1900 and in 1904 and subsequently with the declaration which is made in the preamble here, they will have no difficulty in interpreting the popular opinion, and what, in my judgment, is the final judgment of the American people toward the Filipino people. Sixteen years ago there was a declaration in favor of immediate independence. Sixteen years thereafter there is a declaration which refers to something in the remote future—that is to say, when a stable government shall have been attained—which shows that instead of traveling forward, instead of making progress toward independence, we are receding from the proposition, regardless of party. This declaration in the preamble amounts to nothing more than a declaration in favor of the training of the Filipino people to government, which training ought to be had even should they remain permanently as a part of our people. It gives no additional promise. It gives them nothing which insures independence, nothing which they should have by reason of their independence any more than they should have it by reason of their being a part of a self-governing people. When you analyze the declarations made nearly 20 years ago and the declarations made now, taken in connection with the action of the Senate and the almost universal expression of opinion in regard to it, you find that if there ever was a time when the American people contemplated giving the Filipino people their independence, that time has passed. Let us be candid and, above all, let us cease deceiving these dependent people.

Why, Mr. President, some of the newspapers which handled this subject after the action on the part of the Senate, and denounced it as "scuttling," as a betrayal of duty, as an abandonment of our supreme obligation to those people, were the same papers which 17 years ago were denouncing in most unmeasured terms the attempt to hold the Philippines, or denouncing our taking possession of them at all. Great and strong papers belonging to the same party have so completely changed that you could not have recognized the expression of views made at one time, as compared with the expression of views made at another, as belonging to the same editorial page.

So, Mr. President, I only wanted to suggest to these people in the Philippines that they take off their bonnets and take out their knitting and sit down and be content. They are not on a visit. They are here to stay. I wanted to suggest to them contentment and ease; I wanted to ask them to address themselves henceforth not to the subject of independence but to the matter of fitting themselves to become an integral and permanent part of a great Republic.

Mr. President, another illustration: If we look back over the history of our country, we find that while professing at all times, as in this preamble, to have no intention to acquire additional territory—the preamble says—

> Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement—

And so forth—while that declaration is made here, and is a restatement of the declaration made from time to time in the history of our country in different ways from the beginning, yet, nevertheless, we have always been gathering in territory. We have always been adding. We have never gone to war without coming back with some additional territory, and we have never let any of it go. Any territory which was actually taken possession of or which came under our control and was recognized as belonging to us at the time it was taken possession of has been retained, notwithstanding this declaration has been repeated time and time again as the policy of the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Senator from Idaho cite me a case in which the specific statement has been made by the Congress and the President of the United States referring to territory so taken.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the declaration has been made upon the part of the Government and upon the part of the leading men of the country, statesmen and publicists, from the beginning of the Government, that the Government of the United States never entertained an idea of aggression for the purpose of acquiring territory. That has been repeated time and time again. It has been our declared policy. I do not know that it has been put in the form of a resolution and adopted here by Congress, with the exception of Cuba.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is here confusing in his statement the platform of a party adopted in the heat of a campaign 17 years ago with a solemn legislative declaration which has been adopted in this bill, and which is in the nature of a compromise—a declaration which has received the support of a very large number of Republicans in the House of Representatives as well as a large number of Republicans in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. There is no reason why it should not, for it may be held to mean much or mean little.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is no longer a party declaration, but is a declaration of a responsible government, participated in not only by Democrats but by Republicans as well.

Mr. BORAH. Let us read this preamble, and I should like to have some one tell me what it means:

> Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

That is a preamble in a bill that when a stable government can be established it is the intention of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty. In the first place, it would not be binding upon subsequent Congresses; and does the Senator count this mere preamble in a bill anything as against the most pronounced expression of public opinion upon the part of the entire country at the time when we had undertaken to carry out the pledge which his party had made to the people? Does the Senator count this preamble of any force in the face of the clear declaration of his party nearly 20 years ago? If in 20 years we recede from clear statements to the utmost ambiguity when shall our promise be fulfilled?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator inquired what the preamble means. I suggest that it means, for one thing, that we are deceiving the Filipino people by holding out to them the hope that they will some time be given independence, when this Government has no such intention.

Mr. BORAH. I did not use the word "deceive," because it might be calculated to reflect upon the committee. I have no doubt but that the members of the committee, particularly the Senator who has charge of this bill [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], are sincere believers in the proposition that at some time the Government of the United States will give the Filipino people their freedom; but, as a matter of fact, the Senator from California is correct. It is misleading the people of the Philippines.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator really think it is misleading anybody?

Mr. BORAH. I think it is calculated to mislead those people. It is not misleading anybody here.

Mr. THOMAS. Does it not mean in substance that we are committed to the policy of giving to the Philippines independence when we think they ought to have it, and they never will have it so long as they are useful to us?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. President, we have been about 20 years, like a crawfish, moving backward upon this proposition. In 20 years more you will have larger investments upon the part of the American people in the Philippine Islands. You will have a stronger public sentiment in the United States toward holding them, and you will have tremendous influences in this country which have had a powerful effect in shaping legislation still more determined to keep the Philippines.

I do not believe that we ought to mislead the Filipino people into the belief that they are going to receive their independence under any conceivable conditions which the human mind can now outline and concerning which we can make a promise. It is infinitely better that they settle down and adjust themselves to the fact that they are a part of us; that they have become incorporated into the possessions of the United States; and that, for weal or woe, we are linked together and must try as best we may to work out our interests in common.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with the Senator. Does it not also involve, if we are to preserve our own institutions and the characteristics of our Government, the necessity of also incorporating them into our citizenship and giving them as far as we can that right of self-government which all people living under the American flag enjoy?

Mr. BORAH. I agree perfectly with the Senator. My controlling reason for voting for the freedom of the Filipinos and the complete independence of the Filipinos was because I did not believe that they would be ever fitted for citizenship. I thought it was a menace to the Republic. I believe so yet.

But I have no doubt upon the other proposition that if they are going to remain a permanent part of this Republic it is our duty to exert ourselves in every conceivable way to train them for citizenship and let them understand that they are to be ultimately incorporated as a part of the citizenship of the United States.

I am utterly opposed to the proposition of having subjects. I would rather undertake the other road of incorporating every class of people over whom we exercise control in our citizenship than to undertake to preserve a republic upon the principle of ruler and subjects. I think it is a perilous task we are assuming; but we have assumed it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator express his view as to the effect with reference to the Filipinos or his opinion of what will be done by the American people? Does the Senator from Idaho think that the Government of the United States should hold those people as subjects and the islands as dependencies?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. When the people of the United States, without reference to the investments made by Americans in the Philippine Islands, have come to the conclusion that it is best for the Filipino that his independence be given him does not the Senator from Idaho think that this Government will give it to him? In other words, does not the Senator think that in all of our dealings with the Philippine Islands that the interest of the Filipinos should be of paramount concern?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I voted to give them their independence, and of course, if I had my way about it, I would give them their independence. I am anxious for this Government to do what it can in the way of moralizing, civilizing, and Christianizing the world and in the matter of missionary work wherever it can, but I do not want it to go so far as to imperil the Republic itself. I want to stop on this side of the point where I believe it is imperiling our form of government and the principles upon which we attempted to build the Republic. I am willing for us to exercise our influence for the betterment of any people with whom we come in contact.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator very fully in the matter of having our Government help other nations to better living and a higher life, and I think also it would be very unfortunate for the American Government to incorporate the Filipinos or any of the colored races into our citizenship. We have enough of the black virus in the body politic already to threaten the Nation with mongrelization. But if the Senator thinks that the Filipino should be given his independence and the right to govern his own country when he shows that he is capable of doing it, is it not rather extraordinary for the Senator to assume or indulge the presumption that the American people are not ultimately going to do the right thing by the Filipino just as the Senator would do if he had the power? If a thing is right and I believe in it, my faith in human nature is such that I always indulge the presumption that my fellow citizen will do just as I will do when he understands the question as I understand it.

Mr. BORAH. If the American people thought it was the right thing and could see it as the Senator sees it, the American people would undoubtedly do so. But the American people will never conclude that the Filipino people will do better separated than connected with our Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I beg leave to differ from the Senator. I believe to-day a majority of the American people have reached the conclusion that it would be better for America and better for the Filipino that he be given his independence. It is my deliberate judgment that independence would be given but for the investments which Americans have made in the Philippine Islands. That is the influence that forces the Government, or rather induces this Congress, to hold them. It is an instance where human rights are subordinated to business interests.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, with the little investments we have in the Philippine Islands controlling the situation and dominating the Congress of the United States and the executive department, what hope can we hold out to the Filipino people when 25 years more shall be added and we shall have had a tremendous investment in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very hopeful, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States in the course of time may become more responsive to the wishes of the American people in matters of this kind than it is to-day. If the Congressman should consult the interests of the citizen and take orders only from the voters—whose will should be the supreme law of the land—we would have a better Government. The trouble is that platform promises are violated and solemn obligations to the people ignored at the mere behest of the President or to subserve or promote some partisan political interest. I do not like to make a statement of that character, but congressional subserviency has become so common in this day and generation as to excite solicitude and apprehension for the permanency of our coordinate system or form of government. When the people shall understand their power we shall have a very salutary change in our manner of doing things here in Washington.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho can not hold out any assurance to the Senator from Mississippi that he will ever realize his courageous policy. There were but few newspapers, Republican or Democratic, that did not criticize the vote which gave the Filipinos their independence. The great majority not only criticized the vote because they thought the Filipino people now were not prepared for self-government, but they expressed the true Anglo-Saxon spirit, the indomitable spirit which from the beginning has conquered nations and taken possession of the wilderness and moved on and on; that is, that they were a part of the United States and would remain so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. The English Government has established self-governing colonies in the Pacific Ocean. The government which you would have the United States extend to the Filipinos would be of that character—local self-government, with imperial protection?

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator will be good enough to entertain it.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator to restate it, because I thought he was making a statement and not asking a question.

Mr. PHELAN. I will put it, if the Senator pleases, this way: The British Government, as the Senator has stated in a general way, in determining its policy toward its colonies, finally by evolutionary process came to the conclusion that it could not hold subject states under its constitution without the constitution itself breaking down; that this would ultimately affect the liberties of Englishmen. So by degrees the English colonies have become self-governing. The people that now populate those colonies differ in every respect from the aboriginal races. We are dealing with an aboriginal population, a people of different color and different language. It occurred to me, as the Senator has given considerable study to this question, to ask him whether he believes in extending a measure of self-government to the Filipino people and at the same time holding some control so far as this Federal Government is concerned over the lives and fortunes of those people, who, if left alone, would be subject to external attack?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I stated some time ago, if I had my way about it, I would vote for their complete independence, and give them their independence, but that policy being one that has been rejected, I would certainly be in favor of giving them all the exercise in local self-government they can possibly enjoy and use intelligently and with wisdom. I would train them in self-government just as rapidly as they could be trained. I would fit them to become American citizens just as rapidly as they could be fitted, in the hope that sometime they may come to enjoy the real status of an American citizen rather than being a subject of a republic, because to be the subject of a republic is no different from being the subject of an empire.

Mr. PHELAN. I quite concur in the view of the Senator from Idaho. I would like to know from him whether in his judgment the bill which is now before the Senate will grant such a measure of self-government to the Philippine people, and at the same time protect the interests of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I would vote for this bill if the preamble were eliminated.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, it is your conviction that the bill is satisfactory in carrying out your declared views?

Mr. BORAH. So far as the bill provides for additional local self-government it meets with my view. Certainly, to my mind, there is no inconsistency between my desire to give them independence; and not being able to give them that, then to give them that which they can most profitably enjoy in the way of local self-government, and train them as rapidly as possible.

Therefore, as far as I am concerned, the bill is satisfactory, outside of what I conceive to be the misleading statement in the preamble. I think that ought to be cut out, because it holds a hope which will never be realized. It will cause them to be dissatisfied with their condition. If we are going to train them to citizenship it ought to be understood that they are to be satisfied with that training and to become a part of us, and to have a great desire and a great zeal to become citizens of this Republic.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not want to anticipate the Senator's speech, but I would like to ask him another question. Probably he contemplates discussing it. Would the Philippine Islands if so held be an asset or a liability to the United States in view of foreign complications?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about the fact that they are a liability, and a tremendous liability. They are a liability not only by reason of foreign complications; they are a liability because they wrench, readjust, and distort, and demoralize our whole conception of a republic.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. I can not conceive of this Republic exercising the power over this people which it is bound to exercise upon any principle which originally inheres in this Government. We are entering upon another field of duty entirely. We are taking up new obligations, and we must meet them as best we may. I would discard the whole situation by giving them their independence. Not being able to do that, then we must train them for citizenship as best we may. So, if the preamble of the bill were stricken out, I could gladly support it. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion as to the preamble, I am a believer in the complete independence of the Philippines, and I believe in the preamble; but if I believed as the Senator from Idaho believes, I would still be in favor of the preamble, and for this reason: The islands will never be anything but a source of trouble to us unless we give the electorate to the Filipinos, as to whether they want independence. It is like a man who goes to a bank; as long as he can not get his money out of the bank, he wants his money, but just as quick as the cashier tenders it, then he does not want it.

If I did not believe in giving the Filipinos independence, I would not want the Philippine Islands to be a part of the United States unless the Filipinos were willing to become so; and you can never make them willing to become so unless you tender and offer to them independence, and rely upon the inducement that you would make to them that it is better for them to stay in the country.

For that reason it seems to me that, whether we are in favor of separating from them now or at any other time, or whether of holding them, they can only be held to the advantage of the United States by giving them this option and letting them determine the question. If the inducements are in favor of their remaining, and they conclude to do so, perhaps they can do so with satisfaction and be an asset to the country instead of a liability.

Mr. BORAH. If I thought the American people would ever let loose the Philippines, I would look upon the matter something as the Senator from Colorado does. But I feel so certain that conditions will be arguing against it all the time, and working against it all the time, and building against it all the time, that 20 years from now there will be infinitely less chance for independence than they have to-day, and therefore they should use the 20 years in the meantime in fitting themselves for another duty and adjusting conditions to another condition of affairs.

I think we ought to strike out the preamble, and I would be glad to put something in the place in the way of a certain positive declaration; but I know the Congress will not do that. I know it will never declare for independence, but it will run along until events will settle it. Seventeen years have bound them more closely to us; they are more a part of us than they ever were before; and when we consider the fact that the same influence will be working more strongly to bind them to us in the next 17 years, it seems to me, with all due respect to the committee, we ought to so declare.

Mr. President, we are so anxious for additional territory that we are disposed to pay exorbitant prices for anything that is in sight. There are three islands over here in the West Indies that we are disposed to pay $25,000,000 for, and I should like to hear some one state why we want those three islands at $25,000,000. They tell us that there is a fine port or harbor in St. Thomas. That is true enough, but we have like conveniences at other places. That port is hundreds of miles from the canal. We have Porto Rico, Culebra, Guantanamo, and other posts equally available and equally desirable. But we are disposed to purchase St. Thomas, and if we knew the number of dollars and cents which Denmark has put into St. Thomas in the last 20 years we would understand that $25,000,000 is a small amount compared with what it will cost to have St. Thomas. We do not need her harbor, as we have more desirable harbors in that region.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the answer to the Senator's comment is obvious. The reason why we took possession of the customhouse and fiscal government of Santo Domingo was to prevent creditors representing foreign Governments to levy upon those customhouses, which ultimately might lead to the presence of a foreign power in the Caribbean. Denmark is an important country, and we could not take possession of that customhouse, even if their finances were disarranged. It has been intimated in the press and elsewhere that foreign Governments covet the islands. So, in order to prevent foreign Governments from securing a foothold, it is necessary for the United States, with its other possessions in the West Indies, to possess those islands.

As to the amount, that is a matter for arrangement between the contracting parties; but it occurs to me that as a battleship costs probably $20,000,000, we could have in those islands a permanent battleship, an armed base, at a cost of about $20,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. We have infinitely better battleships in those seas right now in our own possessions.

Mr. PHELAN. But we do not want a foreign battleship permanently by the side of our battleship at Porto Rico.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. But will the Senator tell me how, under the Monroe doctrine, Germany or any other power can take possession of those islands?

Mr. PHELAN. Simply by the same means that they have taken possession of Alsace and other countries in Europe, without let or hindrance.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, then $25,000,000 will not stand in the way, because it will be a question of force. If the Monroe doctrine does not give us the right to deny them the right to take possession of those islands or to acquire an interest there or to acquire title there, then we have misread it for these last 75 years; in other words, are we going to be placed in a position where we must buy respect for the Monroe doctrine every time a foreign power intimates that it might like to acquire something within these boundaries? The Monroe doctrine means something, and we have the same right to say to Germany, or to any other power, "You can not acquire title to those islands under the Monroe doctrine" that we would have to say it if we should buy the title to them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to suggest to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who observed that the question of price was a matter between the contracting parties, that it occurs to me that the amount to be paid for these islands is a matter as to which the American taxpayer might be taken into account. Somebody else besides the contracting parties will furnish the sinews of war with which to pay for these unnecessary things.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. It occurs to me that if we have title to the property by reason of purchase we have a much stronger hold upon the islands than by the vague assertion of the Monroe doctrine, which, I submit, has not been formally accepted by foreign Governments. It is merely a declaration by the United States, and it has been invaded several times. Foreign Governernments have sought a lodgment upon the South American coast. I read a circumstantial account but yesterday of German warships side by side with an American warship in the harbor of Haiti at the very time of the outbreak of the European war. Marines were actually landed, though afterwards they were withdrawn; the German steamship steamed away; but the American ship was there for the protection not only of American interests, but for the protection of foreign interests under the Monroe doctrine. There was apparently no warrant for such interference, and yet it occurred.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is only one thing behind the Monroe doctrine, and that is force. The Monroe doctrine is worth just as much as the strength of the United States makes it worth. It is not international law; it is a policy dependent for its effectiveness upon our ability to maintain it.

Mr. PHELAN. But does the Senator consider the brigandage of European nations as so pronounced as to equally justify them in invading our territory in the Danish West Indies if we own them by purchase as an invasion of that territory would be if we only claimed them by the vague Monroe doctrine? Would title by purchase not more effectually prevent such an invasion by a foreign Government or power?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any danger of invasion of the Monroe doctrine as it stands, as the situation now presents itself, at all. I do not think there is any Government of Europe that has any intention of invading the Monroe doctrine. There has been no reliable information to that effect; there is no fact upon which to present and to form an intelligent opinion to that effect. It is true, as the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] says, that the Monroe doctrine has not been formally accepted by European powers; but there has been no manifestation of an intention to dispute the principles of the Monroe doctrine. And, sir, when it is disputed, it will be defended as quickly as a deed of title.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I submit that in the year 1894, under the administration of President Cleveland, there was an attempt made to trespass, I will call it, upon the Monroe doctrine in Venezuela; and later, after the Spanish-American War, we had to mobilize our Navy in the Caribbean Sea in order to prevent other aggressions; which fact is probably familiar to the Senators present. I cited the Haitian case, which occurred at the outbreak of the European war. There is a deep-seated conviction on the part of the people that after the European war nations bent upon reimbursing themselves for their losses will even be less careful in complying with their international obligations. Unless that be true, I can not understand why the Senator from Idaho is proposing to vote for the great increase in our Naval and Military Establishment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to continue this discussion too long, because it is desired to get a vote; but we get back to the same proposition, I will say to the Senator from California, that if there is a disposition on the part of the European nations to infringe upon the rights of this Government in any way and that they shall disregard the Monroe doctrine, to what will it lead? It will lead to the same situation precisely as if they should disregard any other right. So back of it all there is the proposition whether the United States is going to defend not only its actual title, its actual purchases, but whether or not it is going to defend the Monroe doctrine as it understands it to be.

Mr. LEWIS. Will not the Senator from Idaho concede that if we ever enter upon this theory that the islands of Denmark are necessary in order to preserve the Monroe doctrine, the same theory must apply to the West Indies?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. And that the same theory must lead us to possess ourselves of all islands that are in the seas to the south of us in order to maintain the whole Western Hemisphere for the United States and to avoid the seizure of any of those islands by any nation that might wish to seize them for personal reasons or otherwise?

Mr. BORAH. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. It seems to me we have entered upon that course.

Mr. BORAH. But there is another proposition, Mr. President. If we are going to buy respect for the Monroe doctrine, of course the Monroe doctrine has become utterly worthless. It is not only worthless, but it has become a liability. We can not purchase respect for the Monroe doctrine. If that is to be the established doctrine, of course it will not be long until, as the Senator from Illinois says, there will be another occasion for the purchase of respect for the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. President, just a concluding word, which shall incorporate what I really rose to say; and that is, that in view of the action of this Congress, in view of the vote of the Senate upon this matter a few weeks ago, and the final action of the Congress upon it, it ought to serve notice upon the Filipino people that, notwithstanding this or that individual declaration, notwithstanding preambles which may be adopted here or elsewhere, and notwithstanding resolutions which may be adopted by political parties, the judgment of the American people is made up to the effect that the Philippine Islands has become a part of our permanent possessions, and will remain so. I should like to see the Filipino people adjust themselves to that fact; I should like to see them adjust themselves to that idea, and to harmonize their action and their endeavors and their purposes in the future with that policy. It will be better for them, it will conserve their happiness, it will conserve their welfare in every way, if they will accept the situation as it is, and no longer pursue the ignis fatuus which has been held up before them; but concede that the question has been settled, that they are a permanent part of our possessions, and that their ambition in the future will be to help build up their country and become a permanent part of the Republic.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I can not refrain from saying a word in protest against the conference report. I have taken deep interest in the Philippine question ever since the bill was first presented. My protest relates chiefly to the preamble. I can not help but think, Mr. President, that the preamble to this bill as now agreed upon by the conferees is a vicious thing, if I may be permitted to express myself by a term so emphatic as that. It is so, I think, because of the false hope it holds out to the Filipinos, because of the political ambitions it will incite, because of the greater difficulty we will find by reason of this preamble in our management and government of the Philippines.

From the campaign of 1900 on down to the present time the Philippine question has been made by the Democratic Party a party question. Notwithstanding the leader of the Democratic Party had been here and advocated the ratification of the treaty with Spain whereby we acquired the Philippines, their acquisition and their government since have been in platform after platform enunciated by the Democratic Party denounced as an inexcusable blunder. Having acquired them, Mr. President, the question is, What in the name of common sense could we have done otherwise than what we have done? That is the practical question. Have we not done all that was possible in the way of education and development of the Filipino people? Have not they themselves so far shown a grateful appreciation of the Government of the United States and what it was seeking to do for the Filipinos themselves? That which has hampered and hindered in our management of the Philippines, that has prevented investment there, that has prevented development that otherwise would have been made in the Philippines, has been the ceaseless party agitation in regard to them and the uncertainty which has arisen all along because of the Democratic position concerning Philippine independence.

Mr. President, the Philippine Islands are a region of vast natural resources—agricultural resources, mineral resources, forest resources—largely undeveloped or untouched. I take it as a fundamental principle that until a people have been educated up to an appreciation of the value of resources which nature with bountiful hand has bestowed upon them they are not capable of self, free, independent government; and I think it is apparent that the masses of the Filipinos themselves do not know, do not appreciate, and have as yet not taken advantage of their resources. In order that they may do so it will take many years yet of tutelage, of education. Until they do so it is useless to talk about complete and full autonomy, let alone absolute independence, the hope of which is held out in this preamble.

Mr. President, I wish to read a few words from a recent author in regard to the resources of the Philippines, not at all as a tempting bait to American investment or as a reason why we should retain them, but as preliminary to the conclusions to which the author comes. He says:

> The Tropics are the regions of the earth in which nature has been most lavish in her gifts to man. Rubber, coffee, cocoa, dyestuffs and drugs, gums, sugar, teak, mahogany, and other precious woods, jute and hemp, tea, tobacco, and many valued fruits—these are exclusively or in large part tropical products. The use of them on the part of the inhabitants of temperate climates is constantly increasing. The interest of Europe and temperate America in the Tropics is therefore well founded. And of all tropical countries, the Philippines appear to offer the greatest diversity of riches coupled with a greater accessibility than is the case with any other except the Dutch Indies.
> The archipelago is in many places very wild and mountainous and its mineral wealth is to a great extent still undiscovered. Yet copper, gold, lead, petroleum, zinc, mercury, antimony, platinum, and iron have been found in quantity, and some day the mineral resources of the islands will be a conspicuous item in their natural wealth.

I wish now to call particular attention to this statement:

> That day, however, must wait upon the investment of large amounts of capital, and capital will wait upon the permanent establishment of stable conditions.

Further along, and somewhat in the same line, the author says:

> The prosperity of the islands, in the main, will depend upon the development of their natural resources, mineral and agricultural, and this in turn will depend upon two factors—on the one hand, the investment of large amounts of capital, and, on the other hand, an increased efficiency of the available labor. Both of these, but particularly the former, in turn are dependent upon long-continued peaceful conditions. The timidity of capital is axiomatic. At the present time, and for some years, few, if any, large investments have been made on account of the uncertainty regarding the plans and purposes of the United States toward the Philippines.

The uncertainty of the plans of the United States toward the Philippines has been exhibited and demonstrated again and again by Democratic platform declarations, by the Jones bill, and by the preamble which is presented by this conference report. And so the author continues:

> This timidity has not been allayed, either by the introduction of party politics in the present Philippine administration or the recent agitation in connection with the so-called Jones bill introduced in the Sixty-third Congress.

And that brings it right down to date, the preamble of this bill, as I understand, being substantially, if not the same, as the preamble to the Jones bill.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator did not give us the name of the book.

Mr. STERLING. I omitted that. The book is entitled "Japanese Expansion and American Policies," by James Francis Abbott, Ph. D., sometime instructor in the Imperial Japanese Naval Academy. He is the author of the book, which is published by Macmillan & Co.

Mr. President, I am just in receipt of a letter from the Philippines this morning, not written in answer to any request of mine, wholly unsolicited. It is from a gentleman who has been there a great many years, and who has been in the customs service there, whose name I do not care to divulge. He says:

> We must make a definite policy for these far-away islands, stop this everlasting promise of independence and promises, establish a Territorial form of government, and tell the people, not the politicians, that some time in the future, when they are socially, economically, and politically prepared to govern themselves, they will secure their independence, but only by consent of the people of the United States.

And toward the close he has this to say, which I think is highly significant. I read it, too, in connection with some inquiries made here this morning—an inquiry made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], for example, who is at present not in the Chamber, in regard to the sentiment of the people of the United States concerning our retention of the Philippines. Mr. President, I believe that I know, not only from newspaper statements but from many letters received, something of the sentiment of the people, especially of the great Northwest, in regard to our retention of the Philippines. They are opposed, so far as I can gather, to any promise of independence in the near or remote future, although not as yet expressing themselves against ultimate independence; but the feeling is strong that the Filipinos are not ready for independence, and will not be for a great many years, and that it is futile—more than that, it is wrong—to hold out a promise or a hope to them along those lines. Here is the statement:

> The first Tuesday in November means a great deal to these islands and the inhabitants thereof; it will decide the question of immediate independence and later tribal wars and strife, or a stable government and prosperity.

So it can be seen, Mr. President, how they feel there—how Americans and Europeans in the Philippine Islands, with their close knowledge of conditions, feel—in regard to this declaration in the preamble concerning independence. It seems to me that a declaration like this in a bill for the government of the Philippine Islands, under all the conditions and circumstances, is little short of puerile.

Mr. President, a hundred years ago or more British statesmen were debating whether they should not give up Canada, or permit Canada to be free and independent of England.

It was said—and I think Lord Ashburton said it—that England ought to get rid of Canada, for it would be nothing but a breeder of quarrels. Yet the great Dominion of Canada to-day, after the lapse of 100 years, is loyal and true, and glad to be a part of the British Empire. So it is with Australia. So it is with her New Zealand possessions. Loyal and true, their sons are now giving up their lives in defense of the mother country.

True, we have a different population in the Philippine Islands, and it will take much longer to educate them so that they will be fit and competent for self-government than it would the people of any of England's possessions which I have mentioned; they were competent from the beginning, of course. The Filipinos are a different race; and, furthermore, they belong to the Tropics.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it not a fact that the loyalty of Canada and the loyalty of Australia is due to the English people and their descendants who have gone to Australia and Canada, rather than to any spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm for the mother country by the original natives of either of those great countries?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think, of course, there is the loyalty of blood, if I may so term it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. That exists, but there is something more than that. England's method of dealing with her colonial possessions during the last 100 years, giving them the largest measure of self-government, makes another bond.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true; but, after all, it is the loyalty of English people and the descendants of English people. There are no native New Zealanders to-day upon the battle fields of Europe. There are no native Canadians—that is, of the original nativity of that country. They are, after all, simply a part and parcel of the parent stock wherever they go; and it is a splendid tribute to them that wherever they go they do remain loyal to the mother country.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, yes; but, Mr. President, it will be remembered that our revolutionary forefathers were a part of the same stock, and nearer akin to the original stock than those who govern now in Canada or Australia and New Zealand, and yet we left the mother country and took up arms against her for our freedom. So I say it is more than anything else because of England's method of governing her colonies since that time that this attachment now exists.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the point I was making was this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota further yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. That Americans in the Philippine Islands will undoubtedly ever be loyal to this country, but the fact that Englishmen in Canada and Australia remain loyal to the mother country is no evidence that the native Filipinos will ever become ready to sacrifice themselves for this Republic. That was the point I was making.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in regard to that I think otherwise. I think that through the long years of good government and wise administration in the Philippines there will be built up a sentiment of loyalty, of attachment, on the part of the native Filipinos toward America, and that when the time comes that they are fit for full and complete autonomy they will say then, "We will be glad to remain a part of imperial America."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I just want to submit an observation.

Individually, if I could have my way, I would see the United States get rid of every foot of over-sea territory. As an individual, aside from the inherent right of a people to govern themselves, I never have believed in holding property that was destined forever to be a liability and never to become an asset, and I would apply the same rule to sovereignty. But I am satisfied that the American people do not and never will consent to the independence of the people of the Philippine Islands. There never comes a time in the opinion of the master when the subject has reached that condition of development where it is wise to let him go.

I regret that we have in this bill a preamble holding out a promise which I know is delusive and which I know can have but one effect, and that is to encourage the Filipinos to believe that some time in our sweet good will, and not theirs, they will obtain their independence. I regret it because I do not believe that time will ever come. I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the sooner, once and for all, we say to the Filipinos, "You are in this jurisdiction to remain; adjust yourselves to this condition; recognize this condition," the sooner we will have in the Philippine Islands a sentiment that they are a part and parcel of what the Senator from South Dakota unintentionally, perhaps, but yet so truthfully, characterized as an imperial Government.

So I believe, Mr. President, in the interest of honesty, in the interest of candor, in the interest of hastening the hour when the Filipino will recognize that he is in connection with this Government to remain forever, the sooner we cease holding out delusive hopes, the sooner, in the language of the Senator from Idaho, "he will take off his bonnet and go to knitting, and sit down with the reflection that he is here to stay."

It is not my theory. I do not believe one people has a right to govern another people against their will, and that an alien people; but I recognize that the fixed purpose of this Republic is to retain the Philippine Islands. When we say we will let them go when, in our opinion, they get a stable government, is a promise which, based upon all human history, we will never reach. We will never reach the point when we see a stable government in their hands; and I believe it would be infinitely better just to come right out honestly and say: "You are here to stay; make the best of it. We will give you the best government that it is in our power to give you. Now, become reconciled to this condition."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Md.
Borah	Harding	Nelson	Smoot
Brady	Hardwick	Oliver	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Overman	Taggart
Bryan	Hughes	Penrose	Thomas
Chamberlain	Husting	Phelan	Thompson
Chilton	James	Pittman	Tillman
Clapp	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pomerene	Underwood
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Reed	Vardaman
Colt	Lane	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Warren
Curtis	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Dillingham	Lippitt	Sherman
Fletcher	McLean	Shields
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Conference.

Mr. McLEAN. It is nearly 2 o'clock. Is it the intention to continue the discussion of this measure, displacing the unfinished business?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The unfinished business has not yet been laid before the Senate, but it is the intention of the Senator in charge of that bill to permit us to finish the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 15455, commonly known as the shipping bill.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that very likely the conference report can be disposed of in a short while, and I ask to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I think the conference report will take some little time before we reach a vote on it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears none and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside. The question is upon agreeing to the report of the confereuce committee.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay action upon this measure. When it was under general discussion early in the session I expressed my views at some length, and I have no desire to repeat them.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this preamble is absurd. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] insists that it amounts to nothing, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] insists that it is vicious. I think it is absurd to undertake now to express the purpose of the people of the United States as to what it may be to-day, what it may be in the future, or what it may have been in the past. I think the action of the Congress upon this measure at this session has demonstrated the accuracy of my position.

If the Philippine question, giving the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands their independence, was the paramount issue in 1900, as was claimed by the candidate of the Democratic Party at that time, then the American people certainly expressed a definite purpose to retain the islands indefinitely, for the Democratic Party was overwhelmingly defeated. If it was the paramount issue in 1908, as was claimed by the then leader of the Democratic Party, the same result followed, and the American people expressed a purpose to retain the islands indefinitely. If it was an issue in 1912, when the Democratic Party was successful at the polls, although the party did not secure a majority of the votes, yet it was entitled to assume the reins of government, and it was its duty to carry out its platform pledges. If, as is claimed by the leaders upon that side of the Chamber, one of those pledges was to grant immediate independence to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, then it was the duty of the majority to redeem that pledge. I think we have had an object lesson here which we can not forget in a week. The Democratic Party did everything it could, exerted every effort, to redeem that pledge and grant independence to the inhabitants of the islands and signally failed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize, however, that this is a conference report and that the section which was passed by the Senate provided for independence in a certain number of years? The preamble is a measure that was passed by the House. Now, the only two points in the conference were whether section 34 of the Senate bill should remain or whether the preamble passed by the House should remain. We yielded on the question of section 34, which granted independence within not less than two years or more than four years, and consequently the only thing that remains is the other proposition, the House preamble. It seems to me that as it is a conference report, and that being the only thing in conference, yet the Senator evidently not being willing to vote for section 34, the only thing to do is to adopt the provision.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I am willing to vote for the bill without the preamble. The Senator knows, as a member of the committee, when the question was first suggested I was opposed to doing anything with regard to the Philippine Islands. As the Senator will remember, we called before us from all over the country men who were in a position to give us more accurate information than we had with regard to conditions there. I modified my views and came to the conclusion that under the circumstances it was wise and best at this time to extend the franchise and grant an elective senate. I am willing now to give the Philippine Islands all the machinery that is necessary for them to demonstrate their ability or inability to maintain a stable, just, and representatve form of government. I am willing to admit that not only the majority in the Senate but in the House and the majority members of the committee have exerted every effort possible to redeem what they have insisted was their party pledge to grant to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands their independence. That promise has been continued by the Democratic Party for 16 years. They now have a majority in both branches of Congress. They have now every opportunity to redeem that promise. I believe they have tried earnestly and honestly to do it, but they have failed. They have found that it is utterly impossible.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be absurd, with this experience, with this record staring you in the face, to undertake now to commit some future Congress to a promise which you could not perform when you had the power.

I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado from what source he can draw the assurance that the Democratic Party in the future will be any more likely to redeem this promise than the Democratic Party of to-day, and by what authority does the Senator from Colorado assume to bind the action of future Congresses or express now what may be the purpose of the American people 5 years or 10 years from now?

Certainly you can get no encouragement from the record of the Democratic Party to-day. When the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] proposed his amendment every majority member of the committee surrendered the position that was taken by him in the committee. The committee report was a compromise. Some wanted to grant independence; others did not. But we all considered the question in a nonpartisan way. I know the minority members of the committee received every courtesy from the Democratic members, and from the first it was the endeavor of the committee to prepare a bill that would seem to be the best possible thing that could be done now. It is clear to me that this is all that any Congress ought to undertake to do. We can not foretell the future. We ought not to undertake to anticipate what may be the duty of some succeeding Congress. The committee agreed upon its report. I conceded my views; others conceded theirs. When the report came into the Senate the Senator from Arkansas proposed his amendment and every member of the majority of the committee abandoned the report of the committee and stood back of the Senator from Arkansas and voted with him, but all to no purpose.

You must realize to-day that you can not carry out your promise to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. You have tried your best to do it. You can not do it. What right have you to declare now that some other Congress shall do it or ought to do it? In view of the experience you have had, discouraging to you, fatal to your hopes at this session, is it not better to do what all agree is wise or a large majority of both branches agree is wise at the present time, extend the franchise and give them an elective senate, give them every opportunity to demonstrate to the people of this country that some day they will be worthy of their independence?

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has taken a very pessimistic view of the future of these islands. He has insisted to-day and heretofore in the discussion of this matter that the time would never come when they could be trusted to manage their own affairs.

Of course, we all know that self-government is a splendid thing and a strong weapon of defense in proper hands, but a very dangerous weapon to play with, a very dangerous weapon in the hands of children.

While I believe the inhabitants of these islands to-day are in comparison with a highly civilized people little more than children, yet I believe they are very apt children, and I do not think it fair for the Senator from Idaho and others to constantly bring in here the experience of Latin American countries as proving the utter inability of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to advance faster than the South American countries have done.

We all know the South American countries secured their liberty from despotism, and, of course, when they secured their liberty they immediately set to work to establish the best thing within their knowledge, and that was another despotism, a democratic despotism perhaps, but none the better on that account. Whereas in the Philippine Islands we have an entirely different experiment. They have advanced rapidly. It takes a long time for a boy to learn good habits in a school where only bad habits are taught; but in a school where only good habits are taught we have no reason to expect that a race of people like the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands will not advance rapidly. That is the belief of everyone who knows them and who has lived there and who has had experience and is capable of judging accurately.

I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho that these people will never be able to govern themselves. I can not agree with him that the time will never come when this Government will not be willing to grant them their independence. We can not say now; we do not know. Let us do our duty as we see it to-day and leave the responsibilities of the future to those who come after us, and who will, by reason of the extended experience in these islands, be in a position to judge wisely when the time comes.

I think this is a very important matter. Preambles are never admissible unless they are based upon a recitation of facts that are uncontroverted and uncontrovertible. It is admitted by those who have discussed it this morning that no one knows what the preamble means. It is susceptible of any interpretation. I refer to the middle clause and to the title as well. The title of the act is absurd:

> To declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands.

No Senator here will claim that we are in a position to do that. The question has never been voted upon separately and settled by the people of the United States. It has always been involved with other questions.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is oblivious to the fact that this preamble is a part of a great Democratic piece of constructive legislation.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator had been in the Chamber when I began my remarks I think he would have listened to some expressions, at least, that would have indicated that I recognized that fact. I do not extend my sympathy to the other side of the Chamber; I do not know that I have any regrets. Nevertheless it is true that with the very best of intentions and after waiting 16 years you find yourselves utterly incapable of carrying out your promise in reference to the Philippines. I am willing to concede that you have tried your best, but you have utterly failed. Now, with this record, how can you presume to declare the purpose of all the people of the United States on this subject? You do not even know what your own purpose is.

The preamble, of course, repeats the language in the title:

> Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence.

That is an absurd assumption, a mere party assumption. There is no historical foundation for it. If it was the issue in 1900, as I have said, the people voted overwhelmingly in favor of a purpose to retain the islands permanently, because your candidate was defeated and your platform went into inoccuous desuetude. It was the same way in 1908.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, is it not infinitely worse to state that purpose contrary to experience than it might be perhaps to state it in accordance with the experience, and therefore state it was not the purpose of the American people to let them go? Back of that we have 16 years. Back of that, and I say it without any partisan spirit, we have the failure of the party in power with a platform pledge to accomplish it. It seems to me it is infinitely less in harmony with the history of the situation to state that it is our purpose to give them independence than it would be to state that it has not been the purpose to let them go.

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment? In view of the fact that I voted to let them go, if anyone should read my interruption of the Senator at this point without an explanation he might feel that there was an apparent inconsistency. I want to say now if it was in my power I would say, "Go, and Godspeed you," but it is not in my power. I know it is not the intention of the American people to let them go, and I think the sooner we recognize that fact the better. I make that explanation, as I might otherwise seem to be inconsistent.

Mr. McLEAN. I know that is the view of the Senator from Minnesota, but it seems to me that when we substituted our authority for that of Spain we assumed a pretty sacred obligation to maintain order in these islands and give the inhabitants of the islands every opportunity to demonstrate to the world their ability to take care of themselves. I think it was a sacred obligation; it was a treaty obligation; and I do not think they have had sufficient time yet. I think it is altogether unjust to expect that in half a generation a people in the condition they were in could come to the front and realize what self-government is and what independence means, its responsibilities and its privileges. I think we may well omit discussion of that question altogether for another period of 8 or 10 years at least.

I do not agree with the Senator from Minnesota. We have accepted this responsibility under a solemn treaty obligation; we ought not to quit now and leave those islands to the prey of the rest of the world or to their own incapacity and ignorance.

Mr. CLAPP. I had not intended to raise that issue. I regard that issue now as settled for all time. I was simply putting in the RECORD the reason why it was that, having voted to give them independence, I am now, in view of the experience of this legislation, opposed to a promise which I know will never be carried out.

Mr. McLEAN. Nothing ought to be considered settled by Congress until it is settled right, and it is for us to assume that nothing will be settled until it is settled right. If any Senator here thinks that it would be an injustice to these people to turn them loose, and yet is willing to do it, then I most emphatically disagree with him.

Mr. CLAPP. Again, I want to say I do not put my willingness to let a man be free upon the basis of turning him loose to escape responsibility. I think every people have a right to be free. I voted to give these people a tentative experiment in self-government, but I say now, for one, I believe the purpose of the American people is against letting these people go, and the sooner we quit holding out a false promise to them the better, I believe, it will be for them. There is no quarrel between the Senator and myself; at least, I did not seek that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. I will yield in one moment. The Senator from Minnesota thinks these people ought to be free. That depends entirely upon what we mean by the word "free." We have some obligation in the premises. I do not believe we have any right to turn these people free to learn the art of self-government in the school of murder and arson and larceny.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator want at this time to review the arson and murder in our own country. I had not intended to open up this argument, because I felt it is an issue that is gone.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not concede that at all.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will never live to see these people independent.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Minnesota says that. I disagree with him. I have too much confidence in the spirit of justice that has dominated and always will dominate the people of this country to assume it. Personally I feel that one result of the great war must be the elimination of the right to title by conquest. I doubt if you can ever have a permanent peace as long as the right to subjugate and annex a smaller and highly civilized nation is admitted in our international law, and I believe that we must set an example in this matter. If we are to lead, certainly it is our flood tide. It is the flood tide in our affairs, which we must take if we expect to lead civilization in the future, and we can not do it if we deal unjustly with a neighbor; but our work in these islands is one of pure philanthropy and entirely unselfish up to date.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the tide in the affairs of men does not go on like the current of a river. It goes on like a tide that is coming in and then going back and then coming in and going a little farther back. The only difference is that the tide in the affairs of men goes on forever and the ocean tide carries a limit.

The Senator is exactly right, in my opinion, when he says that there will never be any permanent universal peace until the idea that one racial component part of mankind has a right to hold another in subjection has been disavowed by the civilized world. There will be no peace in Europe until the Slavonic population which belongs to Austria have been set free to work out their own destiny. There will be no permanent peace until the Lascars are left to work out their own destiny. There will be none until the Bohemians in Austria are left free to work out theirs, none until the Poles in Prussia, in Austria, and Russia are left free to work out theirs. There can be no permanent peace in the world based upon the idea of one language. I will put it that way rather than race, because they are all members of the white race.

It becomes still more extreme when the white race is dominating over a different race until one language has a right to assert its genius and its spirit wherever it may exist. The most superb incident of civilization that has taken place in two or three hundred years was what we witnessed between Sweden and Norway when Norway said, "We want to break up this household and start to housekeeping for ourselves," and then Sweden, another great component part of the Scandinavian people, said, "That is an acknowledged right; go your way in freedom and in peace."

It becomes still worse when the white race undertakes to impose its authority and its despotism upon another race, not only linguistically different but racially different, unassimilable in lawful wedlock, people that the white race do not recognize as being their equals. The time never will come, in my opinion, any more than it has come right now, for the people of the United States of America to say to the Filipinos, "We announce that it is our purpose that some day you shall be free." I wanted to announce a definite date at which they should be free.

The Senator says that he has no sympathy with the idea that we shall disregard what the future may be that these people may make for themselves. I have. I was not elected here as a Senator to represent any part of the Philippine Islands or any part of the Philippine people; I was elected as a Senator to represent the American people in part—or, in a larger sense, the American people without question of part at all. I say that, without regard to what the Filipinos may or may not do with themselves, it is a question of duty with us not to foist our own governmental system by keeping in it as a part of it temporarily that which is absolutely opposed to it in spirit in every particular. We have no right, no matter what these people may do with themselves, to say to them, "You are governmentally our slaves." We had no right to take them; we have no right to keep them. We have no more right to do that than France would have had, after she had helped to defend American independence, to have attempted to assume the sovereignty of the American people.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. McLEAN. Then, why do you not let them go?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have done all I could to let them go, God knows; and I am willing to do all that I can to let them go now.

Mr. McLEAN. But the Senator will have to admit that his party, which has promised them their independence for 16 years, now that it has full power in both Houses can not let them go.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, in a certain sense that is true—unforgivably true, unpardonably true, and pathetically true——

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, in a certain sense, the Senator from Connecticut knows, as well as I do, that it is not true, because if we had assistance from that part of the American people which constitutes the Republican Party, those people would have gone already. Mr. Taft, when he was President, said that we ought to work toward their final independence.

Mr. McLEAN. And that is what a large portion of the Republican Party says to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, then, why do you not help us when the opportunity comes, instead of standing here and blaming us for our impotence, for which we are not responsible?

Mr. McLEAN. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. You helped to make us impotent.

Mr. McLEAN. We are trying to help you; we are trying to help your party stop lying to those people and to let them judge of us by what we do and not by the promises that we make that we can not perform.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut says he is trying to help us do something and to stop lying. That is a pretty serious utterance. It has two sides to it. In the first place, as a party, the Republican Party has not helped us to do something; and, in the second place, it is not a lie for us, if we can do so, to put upon the statute books of the American Nation the expression of the belief that the American people do desire that the Filipino shall finally be free and self-governing. If the Senator had said that, that might or might not be false prophecy. If he had said that the hope that we held out was a hope that we could never consummate, he might have said something true; but when he says that our saying that would be a lie from our standpoint——

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the standpoint of what we desire and of the aspiration which we have, that the American Nation shall never at any time violate its birth principles and its life principles as expressed in the Declaration of Independence, then the Senator said something for which there was no warrant.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me. Of course I intended to represent the Filipino point of view. They think, and I think they will be justified in thinking, that if the Democratic Party fails to carry out a promise reiterated for the period of 16 years, the party has been lying to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. President, the Democratic Party, speaking, as it thought, for the American people, made that promise, or made that declaration of principle, rather, and that declaration of purpose. It is its purpose, it remains its purpose, it will never cease to be its purpose, until the Democratic Party ceases to be spiritually constituted as it ought to be and as it historically has been.

Now, what warrant is there for the general assumption that a people have a right to self-government only in proportion to their ability to govern themselves? The right to self-government is accompanied with the right of self-misgovernment, or, if not, it amounts to nothing.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. People who have the right to govern themselves have a right to govern themselves according to their ideas and not according to my ideas.

Mr. McLEAN. This is a very interesting discussion, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that they will badly govern themselves for a long while I have no doubt; but I equally have no doubt of the fact that they can never learn to govern themselves well except by governing themselves badly at first. A child can not learn to walk except at the expense of stumbling and falling. No nation has ever learned to govern itself except at the expense of misgoverning itself a part of the time.

What have we to do with that? Who made us God's globe-trotting vice regents, to go around and settle, according to our ideas, who in this world is and who is not fit for self-government?

The Senator referred a moment ago, and reference has been made previously, to South American countries. For a long, long series of years those people presented to the world a spectacle of anarchy, of misgovernment; a spectacle of fiasco of government more than anything else; but what has been the consequence? Mexico is still travailing, not yet having given birth to the child of liberty and self-government, but Argentina has come out brightly as one of the civilized nations of the world; Chile has done it; Brazil has almost done it. Little by little they learn. They can not learn from other people.

One word more. I tell you that in all the history of the world there is not an instance where one race or one people ever superposed civilization upon another. They may superpose the veneering; they may superpose a verisimilitude; they can not superpose verity. No people have yet done so, and no people ever will emerge into the full light of civilization and enlightenment unless they do it by their own hard, cruel suffering and experience. It never will happen; it can not happen. You may go along sending "Yankee school marms" to the Philippines until you are dead; you may go along sending southern girls there until you are dead, to teach the Filipinos English and arithmetic and geography, but do you think you are going to make civilized human beings out of them according to your standard in that way? You can no more do it than you can by a fiat of law make a thoroughbred Kentucky horse out of an ass or make a white man out of a negro, or make a Malay out of a Chinaman, or make a Chinaman out of Japanese.

As Lincoln said, there are certain physical and mental differences between races that just simply exist. They come partly from heredity, they come partly from environment, and they come perhaps partly, though none of us knows, from the eternal fiat of God himself. But, however they come, they are there, and you can not change one into the other; you can not make one out of the other; you can no more amalgamate them than you can amalgamate oil and water in a bottle. You can put them up and you can shake them up until you are tired, but when you get through the globules of oil will differentiate themselves and the drops of water will differentiate themselves. There are some things that legislation can not accomplish. You can not go further with legislation than to veneer a piece of pine wood to make it look like oak; but you can not make oak out of it.

Why is it when this bill is up, when the Clarke amendment is substantially defeated—and I am sorry for it—that we can not at any rate adopt the conference report, put a temporary surcease to this business, and give those people out there and leave with them as a precious hope, even if it be nothing more, that at some time they may be left free, under the providence of God, to work out their own destiny in their own way, not in the American way, which is not their way.

How would you like to have them tell you that we should work out the American destiny in their way or that we should work it out in the Japanese way or that we should work it out even in the French way or the English way or the German way—all being members of the same race, the Caucasian? You would not stand for it; you would fight; you would fight with whatever arms you could get; or if you did not, you would be unworthy—well, I will not say that—but if you did not, you ought to do so.

You can not, for the life of you, make Americans out of Filipinos; you can not, for the life of you, superpose upon Filipinos an American civilization, unless it is only skin deep and is a veneer. You can not anywhere in this world, Mr President, undertake to give a people self-government unless you give them the liberty to misgovern themselves at times, as we all do. We do it. I sat in Congress as a Democrat during some twenty-odd years when it seemed to me the whole American people were misgoverning themselves, according to a lot of Republican ideals and so-called principles, and with a view to satisfying what I would call the interests; but which they called by a higher name.

I do not think England is governing herself according to my idea; I am sure Germany is not; and yet I recognize that those people are just as strong physically, just as wise mentally, just as good morally as I am; and that they have the God-granted right of selecting their own pathway and walking in it so long as when walking in that pathway they do not hurt me and my people.

People say to me, "Oh, well, if you turn the Filipinos loose, they will become the prey of Germany or the prey of Japan or the prey of some other country." Why not equally well the prey of any of them as the prey of yours and mine? But I do not concede that they would become the prey of any of them. After Europe has got her belly full of the little trouble that she is carrying on now, she is going to be pretty cautious about starting up new troubles of various descriptions, and even if the Philippine Islands were taken in charge by some other people—and let us assume that they were the Japanese, as the only people who probably would think of it—why would not the Filipinos be happier and better off under the rule of a kindred race than under the rule of a race that absolutely disdains to intermarry with them, as it ought to disdain to do, and as in keeping up its own high standards it must continue to do. Whether that idea of its own standard is a mistake or whether it be a truth and a verity and a reality, it is nevertheless there.

How can you expect at any time to keep up a temple of democracy when you can not have real equality? How can you expect real equality unless you have a confession upon your own side, at any rate, of potential equality in lawful wedlock—which is a question I have frequently asked? You can govern a people in your country well even for them—that is to say, you can give them a better government in your own country than they could give themselves—but to grapple with a problem at home which presents itself as a soil necessity is one thing, and to go out 10,000 or 12,000 miles hunting up new race problems with a view of superposing yourself upon somebody else, when it is totally unnecessary and is not rendered necessary by any home situation, is a totally other thing, an absolutely unnecessary thing, and an absolutely despotic thing.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, when the Senator from Mississippi kindly took me from the floor I had only one thought to add. While his address has suggested a great many things which would be exceedingly interesting if they were at issue here, and which under other circumstances I might feel inclined to dispute, I will not undertake to do so at this time. I do not agree with him, however, that the strong do not have some duties toward the weak or that the fortunate are not obligated to help the unfortunate, and I am rather surprised that he should express the views which he has. I think, as a pure ethnological problem, environment has very much to do with the evolution of a people, and I do not believe it is wise for us to assume that any race which we find occupying a portion of the earth may not in time reach such a state of civilization that they can control and govern themselves if they have the right kind of help. But the idea that I wish to suggest now is this: I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] will admit that this proposed law in its scope and in its purpose is a treaty. It really supplements an existing treaty with Spain. We assumed obligations then which we must meet, and we must meet them courageously and honestly. If it be, as I think, in the nature of a treaty with an alien people, we should be exceedingly scrupulous not to preface the instrument with a preamble which neither they nor we can understand.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the talk which has been indulged in here to the effect that this question is settled, and that we will never give the Filipinos independence, is contrary to all our declarations and actions from the time of the taking of the islands to the present moment.

Mr. McLEAN. Well, let us agree to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not believe that the American people are going to ignore the principle that has been announced in the Declaration of Independence, that the just powers of government are derived "from the consent of the governed"; but it seems to me that that question is not involved in this conference report. It is purely a question as to whether section 34, giving the Filipinos independence in not less than two nor more than four years, should be adopted, or whether the preamble should be adopted; and, that being the case, it seems to me we ought to have a vote upon the question.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Colorado has repeated that statement on several different occasions. He has referred to a technical matter. I want to take the liberty of suggesting to him that I think he is incorrect. What is properly before this body in connection with the conference report is the entire body of the bill. The Senate passed, as an amendment to a previous House bill on the subject of the Philippines, a bill of its own, with a large variety of amendments, amendments in regard to the preamble, in regard to the principle involved, and in regard to the whole body of the bill. One part of the bill, one amendment, is just as much a matter for consideration in dealing with the conference report as any other, and it is perfectly within the province of this body, if I understand the situation aright, to discuss any question involved that was in dispute between the two Houses.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, a motion was made in the House that section 34 be stricken out and a new section was inserted in the shape of a preamble. Now, according to the principles of conferences, as I understand them, when we recede from our position in favor of the CLARKE amendment and accede to their substitute, it of necessity involves the question as to whether we will adopt one or the other. That being the case, that, it seems to me, is the only question involved. That is not like the question as to the first amendment, which involves the entire 33 sections which were stricken out. The striking out of section 34 involved the principles of governing the Philippine Islands, as to their independence, and there was substituted in place of it the preamble. The conferees met, and the question is which of those shall be accepted? When the Senate recedes and we consent to the House amendment, it seems to me that is all that can be done.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, my point is, that inasmuch as this legislation is in the nature of a treaty, I think the Senate is justified in sustaining any position that it may take in the matter; and if the Senate should insist upon the elimination of the preamble, then the bill must pass without it, or we enact no legislation at all. This would be much better than to submit to a proposition that is absurd and unwarranted and will probably bring disgrace to this country and disaster to the Filipinos themselves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that if this conference report is voted down it means that we stand by section 34, which the Senate inserted in the bill? The House has objected to it and has voted against it. If the report is rejected, the duty of the conferees will be to insist upon the Senate amendment, section 34, and known as the Clarke amendment, and the House will insist upon its preamble. That will be the only question for the conferees.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. LANE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the floor for a few moments.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to address the Senate at this time?

Mr. LANE. I did, but I did not secure the floor. The Senator can go ahead.

Mr. CURTIS. I will yield to the Senator, if he wants to occupy the floor now.

Mr. LANE. Does the Senator wish to discuss this subject?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. LANE. Very well; the Senator can go ahead, and I will wait.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the preamble. I think it holds out to the people of the Philippine Islands a false hope, and if we send the measure to them with the preamble we shall have year after year the citizens of that country here asking for independence and for self-government.

Having visited the Philippine Islands a few years ago, I do not agree with some who have discussed this measure as to the ability of the Filipinos to control their own affairs, and, for one, I think it will be a good many years before they are in proper condition for self-government. However, as I said a moment ago, I did not rise to discuss the preamble. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the provision on page 5 of the Senate bill, which reads:

> That no intoxicating drink or drug shall be manufactured for sale or gift, imported for sale or gift, or sold or offered for sale or gift for use as a beverage, but this shall not apply to or include the native wines and beverages commonly known as vina, tuba, basi, and tapuy.
> That anyone violating this law relating to the manufacture, sale, or gift of intoxicating liquors or drugs shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

I was very greatly pleased when that amendment was offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and when the Senate adopted it; and I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] that it is one of the items which we should consider in disposing of this conference report. We must either adopt the whole report or reject it; and, for one, I am in favor of rejecting it not only on account of the preamble but also on account of this amendment being rejected in conference.

I notice in the RECORD that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] gave the following as the reason why the prohibition amendment was stricken out:

> The prohibition amendment of which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is the author, and which the Senate engrafted upon the bill as reported by the Senate committee, was a matter of legislation, whereas this bill is not a matter of legislation; but it is a constitution for the Philippine Islands under which they can legislate for themselves. Under this bill, if they desire prohibition, they can enact it. Our bill is designed to give them self-government, with certain constitutional restrictions.

To my mind, that is not a reasonable excuse for rejecting prohibition in this bill. Out in Kansas we have a constitutional prohibition. There is in our constitution a provision prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. I want to say, in passing, that every time that question has come before the people of the State the sentiment in favor of prohibition has grown stronger and stronger, and in my judgment it will continue to grow stronger and stronger. I also desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in a number of the enabling acts of the States Congress has required them to provide for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquor to members of Indian tribes. I remember especially the case of Oklahoma, where the enabling act required the provision to be put into the bill so far as the eastern part of the State was concerned, and afterwards the people of that State submitted the question to the people of the whole State, and prohibition was adopted for the entire State. In all the States recently admitted, the enabling acts have prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors to Indians; and I think any member of the Committee on Indian Affairs or anyone else who has studied the question will agree that the more the sale of intoxicating liquors has been prohibited among the Indians, the greater benefit it has been to the Indian tribes; and I believe to-day that if you would put absolute prohibition in force in the Philippine Islands it would be the greatest blessing you could confer upon those people. It would result only in good.

This morning I received a circular from the people of Porto Rico opposing prohibition because of certain revenues which they derived from the traffic, as I understand. I heard here on the floor, yesterday or day before, that reason advanced for not giving prohibition to the Philippine Islands. I want to say that I agree fully with what was said by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that when these people think they derive any benefit from a license to sell intoxicating liquors, they are mistaken. There is not a State where a prohibition law is in force but that the people will tell you that the benefits are very much greater than the loss of revenue. If I had the time this afternoon I could tell you in reference to the great benefits in our State; and I think, just in passing, I should like to call attention to one thing, and that is you may go to town after town in Kansas where jails were built 25 or 30 years ago that never have been occupied by a single inmate; and if you will talk to the people of these communities, they will give the credit to the enforcement of the prohibitory liquor law.

But I did not intend to discuss at length that feature of the matter. I wanted to call attention to this amendment, and the reasons given by the Senator from Nebraska for the Senate conferees agreeing to have it stricken from the measure.

Again, the Senator from Nebraska said:

> Mr. President, it might be possible if we were dealing with the people of the Philippine Islands, but we are dealing with the House of Representatives, and we found that the conferees on the part of the House had certain very definite opinions.

I doubt very much, Mr. President, whether the question of prohibition was discussed to any very great extent by the conferees. I doubt if a majority of the House would be in favor of striking out that provision if it were brought to their attention.

I desire to call attention to another reason given by the Senator from Nebraska for agreeing to strike this amendment from the bill:

> In addition to that the Democratic convention, which recently assembled and adopted a platform, incorporated a plank in that platform indorsing the bill as it passed the House.

That is given by the Senator from Nebraska as an additional reason for refusing to stand by the Senate amendment prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Philippine Islands. I doubt very much if that question was discussed by the committee on platform at the Democratic national convention. I doubt if that question was submitted to the convention.

I am sorry that the Senator from Nebraska gives those reasons for keeping out this important amendment, because neither of them is good. If this is to be a constitution, why not make it a part of the organic law that they can not manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors in the Philippine Islands? If you put such a provision there, the legislature may afterwards enact legislation in reference to punishment for violators of that law.

For one, I shall vote against this conference report.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Kansas has thoroughly studied the question of temperance as it relates to the Philippine Islands. I am informed that the Filipinos are a very temperate people; and while they have no restrictive laws, yet they are a sober people and not intemperate. If there is any lesson in self-government or self-control which we have to impart to them which will after a while, sometime in the dim and misty future, fit them for carrying on their own affairs, we could on the other hand go to them and learn to good advantage how to restrain our appetite for drink.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRADY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to agree with the Senator that they are a temperate people. I was greatly pleased to notice that fact when visting the various islands. But why not keep intoxicating liquors away from them? The Senator from Oregon will agree with me that the Indians, as they originally were, knew nothing about intoxicating liquor. They cared nothing for it; but as soon as it was introduced among them—and many of the tribes were ruined by its use—it ruined the members who used it.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, in reply to that I will state that the Indians did not make intoxicating drinks, but they took kindly to them when they were presented to them by the white man. In regard to the Filipinos, I am told, from what seems to be a pretty reliable source of information, that they make a drink over in that country alongside of which the Indian hoochinoo is a temperance drink, so far as intoxicating properties are concerned, and yet they are a sober people. They are one of the few peoples in the world who are really temperate.

I do not object to passing a law on that line, though I think it would affect them but little. They care nothing for intoxicants. But we are setting up on a high pedestal and preaching the doctrine that the people shall not have their liberty until the day arrives when they learn from us how to govern themselves wisely, and we could with as good countenance and in good sooth go to them and learn how to keep temperate; and it would save our passing laws to enforce temperance for them when they are already a temperate people.

This is merely said in passing.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I just wondered whether the Senator from Oregon believed that it would encourage them in their present temperance to permit the importation of our liquors and permit the influences that our liquor people will no doubt use toward these people, or whether he does not think it would be better for us to encourage them in the disposition they now have by shutting out these influences?

Mr. LANE. Yes, Mr. President; I agree with the Senator. I think that if we can free the Filipino people from the introduction of our intoxicating drinks, and our method of handling and selling them, it will be a good thing for the Filipinos, and I am in favor of it. But in that case we put the Filipinos on guard against our civilization and our methods; and here a majority of the committee of conference are preaching that the Filipino people will be unfit to govern themselves until the day finally comes when they will acquire such wisdom from us. They are stronger on this point than we are.

That, however, is not what I rose to remark upon. What I wanted to call attention to was this: The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], I think, and also the Senators who represent the conference committee, are insisting that some day these people will be fit to govern themselves. The Senator from Idaho assumes the position that the American people are not in favor of freeing the Filipino people. The conference committee assumes the position, in their action, that the Democratic Party is not in favor of it. I wish to take issue with both theories. The people of this country—the mass and rank and file of them—are willing and would gladly and with kindness let the Filipinos go about their business to govern their own country at any time the vote is put to them on the direct question. That is my opinion. The members of the Democratic Party, so far as I am acquainted with them, are also, in my opinion, almost unanimously in favor of that action upon the part of this Government. The Democratic Party, through its representatives, has stated at different times that it is the duty of this Government to let those people go and govern themselves; and, in my opinion, the conference committee has not correctly represented the sentiment of the Democratic Party, nor has it followed, as it should have done, its pledges.

I am entirely out of agreement with the conferees in their decision. I think it was our plain duty, and it is an abdication of it not to do it at this time; and I would be willing to send the report back to conference and keep it there until they heard from the Democratic Party that it is the wish of their party that our representatives here should let the Philippines go. I think we will have something to answer for, and I think I will have something to explain. So far as I am concerned, I have no very good explanation to make for that sort of conduct upon the part of the representatives, not only of the people but of my particular party, concerning the matter.

The Senate adopted the amendment. We could not get it through the committee. It was opposed in the committee of which I am a member; but we finally fought it out on the floor of this Chamber, and secured the adoption of an amendment allowing those people their freedom after a reasonable length of time—a fixed and definite time, if you please; not delayed until the day when, in our opinion, they are ready, that opinion perhaps being biased upon personal considerations, considerations of profit, or political reasons. Under this conference report, at the time we decide that they are fit to govern we will give them their freedom. That time may never come. It may be another day like this, when the dominant party in power, who have it in their hands to give them their freedom, and who in the past have pledged themselves to do so, for some reason inexplicable to me and unknown to them will not agree that they are quite ripe to pluck out from under our fostering care.

If we do not govern those people better than we govern the interests of the common people, the mass of the people of this country, we ought to be kicked out of the islands. Sixty-five per cent of the people of this country are misgoverned, and have not an inch of the earth's surface in their possession. We are no such a success in our government for it to lie in our mouths to preach to another people how they should manage their affairs, while refusing, despite the pledges of the party, despite the vote in the Senate, to give them liberty, and then adding a preamble in place of it which says: "By and by, maybe, sometime, mañana, we will give you your freedom."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say with relation to the amendment called the Clarke amendment, which was put on to the Senate bill and transferred to the House, that we found it absolutely impossible to insist upon the Clarke amendment. The House of Representatives had substituted for the Clarke amendment the preamble, and had instructed their conferees not to yield on that point. If we did not yield, and they did not yield, it meant that we should have no bill whatever. The Democratic convention even recognized that, for the platform adopted in St. Louis last June has this provision:

> We heartily indorse the provisions of the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives further promoting self-government in the Philippine Islands as being in fulfillment of the policy declared by the Democratic Party in its last national platform, and we reiterate our indorsement of the purpose of ultimate independence for the Philippine Islands expressed in the preamble of that measure.

So that there has been an expression of the Democratic Party, which the Senator referred to, since the passage of that bill through this body.

Mr. LANE. There have been two expressions one way, Mr. President, and one the other way, and you choose the minority one. I would have accepted the majority report on that if I had been in the position of the Senator as a member of the conference committee.

So far as I am concerned, I should be glad and willing to see this conference report referred back to the conferees, and let them take it under consideration—more prayerful consideration, if you please.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I was a minority conferee that represented the Senate in the conference between the two Houses upon this bill. Like the minority representative from the House, I have found myself unable to sign the conference report, and I wish to take a few minutes to explain to the Senate why I was in that position.

The bill that we now have before us is composed of two distinct parts. It is composed of a preamble which recites, or pretends to recite, a principle and a promise, and it is composed of a series of legislative acts which form the body of the bill. When the House received the bill upon this subject that had been passed by the Senate it first rejected the amendment that the Senate had put on for the purpose of insuring independence to the Filipinos in from two to four years and then substituted for the body of the bill their own original bill as it had originally been passed by the House some year or more ago.

I fancy that that substitution was made simply for the purpose of giving their representatives a standing in the conference committee. It was a bill that had been considered by the Senate Committee on the Philippines very carefully for the better part of a year, on which a very large amount of testimony had been taken, and which, as the result of that consideration and those hearings, had received some dozen or fifteen important amendments.

The first inclination of the managers of the dominant party in the Senate, when that bill from the House was received here, was to bring in a motion to concur in it as it stood. After some little discussion better counsel prevailed, and it was decided by the managers of the majority party to have a conference committee appointed and take its various provisions into consideration. As a result of that consideration a very considerable number of useful and wise alterations were made and agreed to on the part of the conferees.

With most of those alterations I was in entire sympathy. They left immigration in the islands largely in the control of the President of the United States. They provided that at the first election for members of the legislature only the present electorate of the islands should exercise the franchise, leaving the enfranchisement of the large number of new voters provided for in this bill to take place at a subsequent election. They also provided for the appointment of an American vice governor, to be appointed by the President of the United States, who should have under his control the department of public instruction, including the bureaus of education and of health. It made other minor changes.

The conferees, however, omitted to include in their bill one or two provisions that had been in the original Senate bill and which it seemed to me were of very considerable importance. Particularly the bill as it is now before the Senate does not provide for leaving the control of what is called the non-Christian tribes, sometimes called the wild people, under an American to be appointed by the President.

It seems to me that that is a very important matter. In the testimony that was given before the Senate committee nothing was insisted upon more strongly by several of the witnesses than that, for the present at least, those people should be under American direction and control. They testified that there had been for generations an antagonism between the Christian Filipino and the non-Christian Filipino, and that violence and a spirit of antipathy was traditional between them. It seemed to me, from the testimony that had been given before the committee, that that was a very important matter that should have been left under the control of an American, as it had been arranged for by the Senate committee; and I very much regret that it was not left under the control of the vice governor, who had been provided for in the Senate bill.

There were some other things of lesser importance. Nevertheless, I think that if there had been nothing of more importance in connection with this matter than the legislative features in the body of the bill, neither I nor the Republican member of the conference committee from the House would have declined to sign the report. While we would not have agreed with all of its provisions, while we would have liked to include in the bill some things that were left out, and perhaps would have left out a few of the things that were included, nevertheless, on the whole, it perhaps might have been regarded as a bill whose legislative features were in accordance with the policy of the Republican Party toward these people while it was in power, which in some respects does not radically differ from the policy of the Democratic Party. It is the policy of both parties to help the education and the development of these people. The difference comes in the purpose which that development and that education are finally to accomplish.

Mr. President, on the question of the preamble—which has already been discussed quite thoroughly here to-day, and which, I can almost say, has been exhaustively discussed—there is a vital difference between the ideas and theories of the two political parties in this country in regard to its importance, its meaning, and its wisdom. I myself feel that it is most objectionable from every standpoint. I believe that its historical statements are inaccurate and false. I believe that its declarations do not properly represent the feeling of the American people in regard to that question.

In order that we may have that matter clearly before us, I want to read the preamble as it appears in the conference report:

> Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and
> Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and
> Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence.

Mr. President, the first paragraph of that preamble declares that it was never the intention in the incipiency of the War with Spain for this country to make it a war of conquest or of territorial aggrandizement. I do not know exactly what was in the minds of the authors of that sentence when they used the expression "war of conquest." How the war we waged against Spain after the blowing up of the Maine, and largely in consequence of that event, was any other than a war of conquest I have not been able to ascertain. We used every military and naval resource in our power to accomplish our ends. Those ends were the military and naval defeat of Spain on land and water. We took away from her some of her fairest possessions in this hemisphere. We took away from her Cuba and Porto Rico, and on the other side of the globe the Philippine Archipelago. If that is not a conquest, I fail to see where the difference in description comes between the expression "a war of conquest" and a description of some other kind of a war.

As to the territorial aggrandizement, which that paragraph says was not our intention, I know of no evidence in existence to show whether there was in the minds of the people of the United States at that time any intention of territorial aggrandizement. So far as I know there is nothing in the records of Congress that shows exactly what was the intention either of this body or of the people they represented. But the fact remains that in spite of the uncertainty of the purpose we did take territory and we hold it to-day, and it is evident that we have no intention of giving it up at present.

It is true that by what was called the Platt amendment at the beginning of the war we declared that we would not retain the island of Cuba, and we kept that declaration, but that declaration had no reference to the island of Porto Rico. Nowhere nor at any time, so far as I know, have we ever made any declaration in any form that we intended to give up the island of Porto Rico. That was territorial aggrandizement obtained as a result of that war. It is territory that I have never heard it intimated from any part of this country or by anyone that we wished to abandon; and in the same way we obtained and have held the Philippines from that day to this.

Therefore to begin a declaration of this kind, which is intended to be a solemn promise, and that will be so regarded by a great many people, with a statement that is false in fact, I think, is unwise, to say the least.

When we come to the second declaration, which is the declaration that it has always been the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein, we are in a little different position from what we were in regard to our knowledge of the intentions of the people toward the declaration of the first paragraph. We have evidence as to what was the intention of the people of the United States as represented by Congress, as to whether or not it was the purpose of the United States to withdraw its sovereignty over the Philippine Islands That question was discussed for many days in the Senate of the United States, and it finally came to a vote, which I want to put into the RECORD, so that the minds of the people may be refreshed in regard to it. On the 6th of February, 1899, when the treaty with Spain in regard to the Philippines was under discussion, Senator Vest offered an amendment to the treaty, as follows:

The United States, desiring that the people of the archipelago shall be enabled to establish a form of free government suitable to their condition and securing the rights of life, liberty, and property and the preservation of order and equal rights therein, assumes for the time being and to the end aforesaid the control of the archipelago, so far as such control shall be needful for the purposes above stated and will provide that the privileges accorded to Spain by Articles IV and V of this treaty shall be enjoyed.

There was an attempt to obtain the opinion of the Senate of the United States upon the question whether or not it was the intention of the American people to abandon its sovereignty in those islands, and the vote upon it was emphatic. By a vote of 53 to 30 that amendment was lost, and it was manifestly indicated that the Senate under that form of an amendment at least had no intention of declaring any purpose to abandon the Philippines.

But that did not end the discussion. Later on in the same day Senator Bacon offered another amendment, as follows:

Resolved further, That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands and assert their determination when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such to transfer to said government upon terms which shall be reasonable and just all rights secured under the cession by Spain and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

That motion was thoroughly discussed, and the vote upon it was 29 to 29, a tie vote, so far as the Senate was concerned, and it was decided in the negative by the vote of the Vice President.

So on two occasions and in two different forms, to meet the possible objections of people who might agree to the principle, but not like the particular clothes which it wore, the question whether or not the United States would withdraw its sovereignty over the Philippine Islands was voted upon by the Senate of the United States, and upon each occasion the decision was that they would not withdraw that sovereignty.

Under these conditions and with that record, which can not be challenged, for the Senate to vote to-day that it has always been the purpose of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty is manifestly to vote that something is so which the record shows is not so. We can not change facts by simply passing votes in this body upon them. The record will remain there in regard to what was really the intention of the people of the United States in spite of any preamble to the contrary that we pass upon now.

There has been something said here during the day regarding the present feeling and opinion of the people of this country upon this Philippine question. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], though himself personally strongly in favor of giving independence to the Philippines, has placed in the RECORD his testimony that the people of this country are not at present in a state of mind that would approve the abandonment of those islands. He referred to having examined with some care the public press at the time this subject was being discussed in Congress. It also occurred to me at that time that it might be useful to have a record of what the press of the country had to say editorially in regard to this question, and I asked one of the clipping bureaus to procure for me all editorials during the week following the defeat of the so-called Clarke amendment in the House of Representatives referring to the Philippine question.

I received something over 150 of those editorials. Many of them were duplicates and some were editorials from papers that had discussed the same question in more than one editorial. There were, however, editorials from 57 different papers that were submitted to me and which I ask permission to have put into the RECORD at the end of my remarks, so that they may be in a form for people to consult later on if this question of the feeling of the American people comes up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will not read them all, but I will read one which I found on the top of the pile, one which, when I looked at it this morning, seemed to confirm the statement made by the Senator from Idaho. It is from the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Citizen, entitled "The Philippine question."

[Brooklyn (N. Y.) Citizen, April 29, 1916.]

THE PHILIPPINE QUESTION.

The 28 Democrats in the House of Representatives who decline to vote for the Philippine bill in its present form have elicited an amazing amount of support from the press of the country. The comment in a majority of cases has been favorable to them, whereas the impression prevailing until recently was that with few exceptions the desire of the American people was to get out of the islands on the shortest possible route.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to his colleague?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. I should like to ask my colleague whether those editorials were to the point that we should never give the Filipino his independence or whether they were directed more to the point that independence should not be granted to the Filipinos at the present time?

Mr. LIPPITT. I recognize the distinction which my colleague is trying to draw and has drawn.

Mr. COLT. I am asking for information.

Mr. LIPPITT. But I will say that they discussed this question from various standpoints, and I have not the matter fresh enough in my mind to be able to answer the question. I was going on to say that those editorials, 57 in number, are not of 57 varieties, they are practically of 1 variety. I think there are only two editorials out of that entire list which even intimate that it would not be wise for the Philippine question to be settled in the House of Representatives in the way it was settled. All but two of them support strongly that settlement of the quesion.

In addition to those which I have asked to have printed I have a full-page editorial from the New York American, under date of May 3, 1916, which takes the same position in a very emphatic manner. I will not ask to have the whole of it printed in the RECORD, but I would like to read the first two paragraphs of that editorial, because it fairly represents what the editor and other people have been saying to their constituents, the testimony which their editorials bear as to the feeling of the American people in regard to this question.

The 28 Democrats who bravely strove to save the Nation from the disgrace of abandoning its duties and from the mistake of sacrificing its opportunities in the Philippines are as much national heroes as the men who fought to save the country from the evils of conquest in the Revolution or of dismemberment in the Rebellion.

The sacrifice of high purpose and high principle would hardly have been greater had we failed in the Revolution; the sacrifice of territory and essential integrity would hardly have been severer, had we lost in the Rebellion, than the sacrifice the Nation would suffer to-day in prestige and possessions through a timid and stupid abandonment of its obligations and opportunities in the Philippines.

So, sir, in the light of this testimony which I have adduced here I think we may accept it as demonstrated that the American people have been entirely satisfied with the course of action Congress took upon the question of granting independence to the Filipinos.

Knowing that this is so, for us to go on and declare, as this preamble does declare, that it is the purpose of the United States to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established is to make a declaration that is contrary to the evidence upon the question. So far as I have been able to discover the opinion of the people of the United States it is not their intention to recognize the independence of the Filipino people for such a cause as that. There is no evidence that it ever has been their purpose. There is evidence that it has been the policy of one particular party in this country, but they are not the people of the United States, and even when they came into the management of the affairs of the United States they did not carry out that policy.

Moreover, Mr. President, I can not imagine why, if we are to give the people of the Philippine Islands their independence, it should be based upon the single requisite of stability of government without any stipulation as to what that stability shall be based upon. A government that is stable may be a monarchy, it may be an oligarchy, it may be the government of a dictator, or it may be a protected government whose stability is derived from the protection of some other nation.

The party that is now in power in the United States has been announcing itself with a great deal of smacking of the lips and glorification as the friend of constitutional government. It has brought the affairs of our neighbor on our southern border into very great disorder by doing what they call championing the cause of constitutional government.

More than 100,000 of our patriotic young men are now down on that border and have been there for nearly two months, the exact purpose of which has not yet been revealed in this effort to establish constitutional government in Mexico. Yet here in the case of the Philippines the theories of the Democratic administration in regard to constitutional government have apparently been thrown to the winds, and its declaration is that it is the purpose of the American people, as represented by that party, to give up the control of the government of the Philippines without regard to what class or kind of government is established there so long as it is stable.

Mr. President, those Philippine Islands have cost this country some hundreds of millions of dollars, nobody knows exactly how much. We paid Spain $20,000,000 for them, and it is now proposed that they shall be abandoned at the very time when the Government that proposes to abandon the islands wants to take $25,000,000 from the pockets of the people to buy an insignificant and useless little group of islands in the West Indies, which will have to be fortified at an expense of how many million dollars is not yet known, and which, when fortified, will have to be protected by an army and navy to be of any value or to prevent them from being used by some other power that perhaps we would not care to have them used by. At one moment they want to go into the pockets of the people to buy territory and the next they want to abandon the territory that we already have and have developed at such an enormous cost.

Nevertheless, that is not the real objection to this preamble. We are dealing with a dependent people. Those people have a right to look to us, and will look to us for fair dealing and for a frank and truthful statement of our intentions. If we pass this preamble, which is not true either in its statements of fact or in its statements of the intention of the American people, so far as any evidence that I can find goes to prove, then we are deceiving those people, we are inviting disorder in those islands, we are holding out to them a promise which we have no intention of fulfilling. We are putting a stain upon our reputation and upon our flag.

After all, Mr. President, a nation, like an individual, has to be, and will be, judged not by what they say but by what they do. It is useless for us to go back and forth making declarations of high principle and altruistic motives if our actions do not conform to those statements. I do not know of any better way to create trouble, not only in the islands to which this declaration particularly applies but in other quarters of the world as well, than for us to hold out promises that we have no power to fulfill, even if we had the intention, for not only does this Senate and this Congress not represent the intentions of the people, as I believe, in this matter, but even if they do, they have no power to bind the Congresses that are to come and that will have to act upon this question. The Congress to come and the people of the generations to come will decide this question, not in accordance with the declarations that we make here to-day, but in accordance with the conditions and circumstances of the time when it comes up for their consideration.

Mr. President, this question has been very thoroughly discussed. I know the purpose of the majority party is to pass this bill. I know that they intend to do it, although there are not a few among their number who do not believe in this doctrine. It has become a party measure. It is in their platform. So argument is not of much benefit at this particular time, because whatever the merits of the question may be, the sincerity of their platform is in question. Of course it has been violated already in this bill. They approved in that platform of a particular, specific bill. An extraordinary proceeding. A plank that could not be carried out, unless the bill to which it referred was passed without the changing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." But in regard to the principle that is involved in it—and I suppose perhaps in fairness it may be said, whatever the language of their plank was, that was the thought they really had in mind—I know that, regardless of the personal opinion of individual Democrats, they are going to vote for this measure.

I felt, Mr. President, that I wanted to explain as well as I could to the Senate and to the people of the country my views in regard to the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator resumes his seat will he permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. LIPPITT. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the purchase of a group in the Danish West Indies, if the language of this preamble is to be retained in the Philippine Island matter would it not be wise to insert in the treaty with Denmark some declaration? We might find in some future time the demand of some uneasy inhabitants of the Danish West Indies to grant them independence. After having paid them a reasonable price for the territory and assumed sovereignty and fortified them and spent a great many millions of dollars, some Delegate might come here and sit in the House of Representatives with some popular demand and clamor for independence. Would not the same reason and the same precedent we have made here be invoked in behalf of the Danish West Indies?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I do not think it is necessary. I myself feel that the people of the United States so thoroughly understand the questions that are going to be submitted to them in November next that they will put in control of the Government those who will take an entirely different course in the management of their affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so.

The matter referred to by Mr. LIPPITT is as follows:

[Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch, May 3, 1916.]

NO PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE NOW.

The defeat of the Philippines bill in the House of Representatives probably means that there will be no legislation on that subject at this session. The Senate is committed to withdrawal at some time within three years and has paid little attention to the details of the Government which the House proposes to continue without time limitation. Even if the Senate were willing to accept the House's view that we should not set a time for withdrawal, it would want to scrutinize the details of the Government, and for that there is not time. So the matter is likely to go by default.

For that there will not be widespread regret. The Philippine question is not pressing. The people there are suffering no tyranny, and most of them are entirely content. The American presence there is one of benevolent guidance and uplift, and there is no division of sentiment in this country that the islands shall have their independence when the people are fitted for self-government. The plea that we ought to withdraw to escape trouble with other nations does not appeal to a great many Americans; it looks like hurrying to cover at a threat, and it is imputing to other nations a spirit of conquest which, as the bane of the world, ought to be laid aside. America does not share it, and is hoping that the rest of the world will repudiate it.

[New York Journal of Commerce, Apr. 29, 1916.]

THE PRESIDENT'S PHILIPPINE MISTAKE.

The action of the caucus of Democratic Representatives and the revolt of a relatively small minority of them, in relation to the Philippine bill indicates that it is likely to be defeated on the final vote in the House. The resolution declaring approval of the bill as it stands and its passage without change was adopted by a vote of 140 to 35, and 28 of the 35 gave notice that they would not be bound by the caucus action. There is hardly a question that some of the 140 voted against their conviction and from party motives and a desire to sustain the President who has been using his influence to carry the measure through. The Republican vote will be nearly if not quite solid against its passage.

The fact is that this mistaken measure has owed its support and its chance of success mainly to the fact that it had the administration behind it, with the President desirous of having it passed at this session. It provides for giving the Philippine Islands over to the self-government for which they are very far from being prepared in four years from the passage of the bill. There is a serious question whether any promise of independence for the islands should be made and certainly provision for making it actual in such a short time is a wrong to their own people and in effect a violation of faith pledged in the treaty with Spain for taking them over as a possession of the United States.

[Washington Star, Apr. 29, 1916.]

THE HOUSE AND THE PHILIPPINES.

The agreement reached in the House to vote on the Philippine question promptly may be the best way out of the situation. It is not easy to understand why the question was included in the President's program. With all the world at war, or disturbed about war; with the Far East involved through Japan's alliance with Great Britain and China's internal dissension, why should we have added to the complications by proposing an early withdrawal from a territory where our rule has been of great benefit to the natives and our presence acceptable to all the leading powers?

* * * * * * * *

And yet the President and his friends in Congress, in opposition to Mr. Bryan on other matters and facing whatever opposition from the outside he can set up at St. Louis, are in this matter of the Philippines playing Mr. Bryan's game. He virtually is the inspiration of what is now being attempted toward lowering the Stars and Stripes in the Philippines and handing the islands over, not to the natives but to a chaos certain to lead to their absorption by some stronger power.

[Washington Post, May 1, 1916.]

Why, then, press for action now the question of Philippine independence, when few, very few, of our people believe the natives are yet fitted for it and that no sane man would accord them until they are fully qualified to exercise the rights of self-government?

Has not the administration enough Villas, Carranzas, and Zapatas to deal with just now without calling forth the Aguinaldos and other agitators of the Philippines to be champions of political, social, and religious reforms in those now peaceful and truly prosperous islands until this proposition of independence for races unfit for it was pressed?

Have not false theories and visionary and illogical practices of this administration brought destruction to American and European investments in Mexico, prompted anarchy, chaos, and crime through that unhappy country to an extent that has made the page one of the most distressing records in the book of time?

What American, be he Democrat, Republican, Progressive or Socialist, desires to duplicate Mexico in the Philippines?

Yet that is just what a vote for Philippine independence at this time or in 4 years or in 10 years will do.

The Democratic Party, responsible as it is, should kill this measure at this time.

The party has enough to defend now.

The Congress should unite to kill this bill.

The country has trouble enough on its hands east, west, and south of our national boundaries, and Philippine independence can well be deferred until the natives are fitted for the duties such grant would impose upon them.

[New Haven (Conn.) Register, May 5, 1916.]

PLEDGES.

"A solemn pledge," the New York World calls the declaration for Philippine independence which the Democratic platform made at Baltimore, and mourns that it is likely to fail. So it was, if one should take the words seriously. But there are others. Let us see about the comparison.

"We reaffirm," said the platform, "the position thrice announced by the Democracy in national convention assembled against a policy of imperialism and colonial exploitation in the Philippines or elsewhere. * * * We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established."

Affirmation favoring, but hardly solemn pledges. For that matter, the Democratic Party seems liable to do that much.

On the other hand, the platform said this in another paragraph: "We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle."

That does look mightily like a pledge, as solemn as any political pledge can be. Yet the Democratic Party in two Congresses has done absolutely nothing to secure the passage of any such constitutional amendment, and is gaily going forward with its plans to renominate at St. Louis next month the "candidate of that convention." Why "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel"? Anyway, why not be consistent in the matter of "solemn pledges"?

[Fort Worth (Tex.) Record, May 3, 1916.]

FUTURE OF THE FILIPINOS.

Only 30 Democrats joined the solid Republican minority in defeating the Clarke amendment to the Senate Philippine bill authorizing independence for the islands within four years. By a vote of 214 to 165 the Clarke amendment was defeated, and later the Jones bill, providing "for a greater measure of self-government in the Philippines," and carrying a preamble declaring the intention of the United States to grant independence ultimately, without fixing a date, was passed by a vote of 251 to 117.

This was the first defeat the administration had sustained since the assembling of Congress, as the Clarke amendment had been given unqualified indorsement by President Wilson. MANUEL L. QUEZON is the Resident Commissioner of the Philippines in Congress. He is for the Clarke amendment heart and soul. He believes that the Filipinos should be given their independence. All the Republicans voted against the Clarke amendment.

QUEZON told the House of Representatives that Japan would seize the islands if they were free, and, moreover, Japan would keep off any European nations that might turn hungry eyes that way.

Japan appears to be very much in evidence in the Far East. She owns Korea; she is dominating China, and the Mikado has his greedy eyes fixed upon the Philippines.

Now the Philippines bill goes to conference between the two Houses, with the opponents of the Clarke amendment satisfied that it is dead at least for this session.

According to Washington dispatches there is nothing in the body of the Jones bill promising independence to the Filipinos or anything in any part of it setting a definite time for a declaration of their independence.

Why should the Filipinos worry? Uncle Sam has his protecting arm around them; he is making large appropriations for the educational uplift of the nation; his warships protect their island shores, and his soldiers guard the civilized Filipinos from the attacks of Moro pirates and the savage tribes of the mountains. Uncle Sam drew a white elephant when the Philippine Islands were tossed into his capacious lap.

THE PHILIPPINE BILL IN THE HOUSE.

The administration suffered a sharp defeat on May 1, for the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill providing that the islands should be given complete independence within four years, which had received the specific indorsement of the President, was decisively defeated in the House of Representatives. It was this feature of the Philippine bill which called forth the severe criticism of ex-Secretary Garrison at the time of his resignation from the Cabinet. It was this feature of the Philippine bill which has been so severely attacked by practically all impartial students of the Philippine situation, and by an overwhelming majority of those who have made the welfare of the Philippines their primary interest.

DON'T MEXICANIZE THE PHILIPPINES.

That shocking proposed display of political irresponsibility, the abandonment of the Philippine Islands, would outdo even the irreparable wrong done to Mexico in the hounding of Huerta, costly as that bit of canting presumption has been in suffering to the millions submerged in an era of Mexican butchery and banditry. Mexico should have taught Mr. Wilson not to play at ideals with other people's blood. It has not brought him to his senses. He is fatuously gambling with the destinies of 8,000,000 Filipinos, threatened with miseries exceeding those of Mexico once they are cast out and marooned, left to their own mercies under a travesty of liberty.

[New York Sun, May 3, 1916.]

Thanks to the common sense and courage of some 30 Democrats under the splendid leadership of Representative FITZGERALD, of New York, the House has rejected the hypocritical and vicious Clarke amendment and definitely substituted the original House or Jones bill for the Senate measure. The Jones bill provides a form of government for the islands in which the Filipinos will have a larger representation and greater responsibility, and it follows the Democratic platform by promising independence "as soon as a stable government can be established." The Senate wisely shows a disposition to throw the Clarke amendment overboard and accept the House bill.

Mr. Wilson's leadership has suffered a palpable check, and the independent Democrats have administered a rebuke which it would be well for him to take to heart. They have set his feet once more in the straight path, the path of fidelity to party principles and the humanities, from which he strayed so unaccountably.

[New York Tribune, May 4, 1916.]

THE END OF A LEADER.

The defeat in the House of Representatives of the Clarke Philippine bill is the rudest blow yet struck at Mr. Wilson's prestige as a party leader. It is the first time that either branch of Congress has turned him down relentlessly and without quarter.

It is gratifying that the House's repudiation of Mr. Wilson's leadership has come on so clear and sharp an issue as the maintenance of our public faith and the continuance of the generous-minded task which we have undertaken in the Philippines as a trustee for civilization. On no other point could the unsteadiness, the wishy-washy opportunism, the indifference to national traditions and interests which have wrecked the President's statesmanship be better emphasized. He stood on the Philippines bill for a betrayal of national honor and national duty—and he stood for it fruitlessly, even so far as his own personal fortunes are concerned.

His own party is unwilling to follow him longer. It is itself beginning to put on his methods and policies the stamp of futility and failure so richly deserved.

[New York Globe, Apr. 28, 1916.]

NO PHILIPPINE PLEDGE NOW.

The division developed in the House Democratic caucus over the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill and the passage of a resolution that takes the amendment out of the party-measure class make it practically certain that no pledge of Philippine independence will be passed by the present Congress. President Wilson has steadily urged the making of the pledge, but his advice does not promise to be followed.

The country as a whole will be satisfied with this action. The feeling is common, even among those who believe that it is immoral and impolitic to govern the Filipinos against their will; that the time has not yet arrived to withdraw from the Philippines. It is not yet clear, looking at matters practically, that conditions are such as to warrant decisive action.

The Clarke amendment is objectionable in that it is merely an academic declaration. It is contingent. It provides, in the form it is proposed to press it, that in 10 years, if the Filipinos then want independence and Congress deems it wise to grant their request, for the setting up of a new nation under American protection. It would seem unwise to attempt to bind the future in this way. No one knows what conditions will exist in 1926.

STRATEGICAL RETREAT.

"An independence bill for the Philippines will be passed at this session. It may be necessary to modify the bill by providing for independence within 5 or even 10 years, but the Philippine bill must pass."

So says Representative JONES, chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee of the House That "even 10" is a mighty concession, but it has been so readily made, now that 35 recalcitrant Democrats have signified "thumbs down" on the measure, that apparently Mr. JONES is prepared to make it 15 or 25 or even 50 years—anything in order that the bill shall pass. Amend the bill sufficiently, Mr. JONES, and your prediction that it "will be passed at this session" will be realized. There's nothing like a strategical retreat to achieve a forlorn hope.

[New York Herald, May 3, 1916.]

DEMOCRACY FINDS SOME LEADERSHIP IN TAMMANY.

Tammany leadership prevented the Democratic majority of the House of Representatives from committing the suicidal blunder of pledging itself to "scuttle" from the Philippines. Some who opposed the obnoxious Clarke amendment in caucus weakened when the final test came, but Tammany stood firm and was able to impart similar firmness to others, who have learned to know sane leadership when they see it.

It was no half-way, "fifty-fifty" victory. Not only was the Clarke amendment defeated by a substantial majority, but upon the motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York, the House conferees were specifically instructed, by a vote of 203 to 154, not to agree to any time limit on the subject of independence.

[New York Republican, May 6, 1916.]

Fixing a definite time for withdrawal from the Philippines, with no special regard to the question whether the islands are ready to maintain so stable a government as to give no occasion for foreign intervention, is a policy that would hardly indicate a deep sense of international obligation on the part of the United States. If the Philippines were given their independence and then presented a spectacle of anarchy and disorder they would immediately become the object of competing imperialistis ambitions. Japan would lay claim to the right to establish order, and some other nation—England, Germany, or France—would present a competing claim. Whether the dispute would be settled by diplomacy or force would depend upon an international situation that no one can now foresee. So much, however, is certain: Weak and disorderly States have for generations been the most serious menace to the world's peace, and are likely to exert a similar pernicious function for a long time to come. If the House had adopted the Clarke amendment, providing for abandonment of the Philippines within four years, the chances are that we should have created another such weak State, another international menace. We might thereby have reduced our own risk of war, but of this we are by no means certain. Anything that works for a reopening of imperialistic competition in the Pacific is a matter of very intimate concern to us.

[New York World, Apr. 28, 1916.]

LOOKING FOR TROUBLE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The Philippine bill, which has encountered such fierce opposition in the House at Washington, embraces legislation of importance to the welfare of the islands. Besides meeting adequately some social and economic problems, it extends the principle of home rule and greatly strengthens existing guaranties of liberty.

As presented to the Senate, the measure in its preamble promised ultimate independence. An elaborate amendment proposed by Senator CLARKE, of Arkansas, provides that in not less than two or more then four years from the enactment of the law, if the President is satisfied that the people are capable of self-government, the United States shall withdraw from the islands and leave them to their own resources.

This is the mischievous proposition which is resisted in the House and threatens the defeat of the entire bill. To press it in times like these, when no man can foresee the results of world-wide war and when the fate of small nations as well as great is in the balance, would seem to be the very limit of rashness. No such action is needed in order to keep faith with our dependency.

Both parties are pledged to Philippine independence, which must come in due season when a Congress then sitting shall be satisfied that all the conditions are favorable. A specific promise now is likely to raise false hopes, and its almost certain cancellation, as provided for, could hardly fail to involve us in serious complications. To get rid of the vicious Clarke amendment it ought not to be necessary to defeat the entire bill.

[New York Times, Apr. 29, 1916.]

ABANDON THE BILL.

In regard to the proposed Philippines legislation the World believes that it ought to be possible to get rid of the obnoxious Clarke amendment without defeating the entire bill. But the Clarke amendment is really the essence of the bill, which was originally planned as a scuttling measure. Senator CLARKE managed to restore to the bill its original purpose, which was to commit this country to the abandonment of its obligation to develop the Philippines and make its people fit to govern themselves. The whole bill ought to be defeated, if it is brought to a vote. It was conceived in the wrong spirit. There is no evidence that it is a well-considered, constructive measure or that the administrative changes it provides for are needed. The World admits that "a specific promise—of independence—now is likely to raise false hopes, and its almost certain cancellation, as provided for, could hardly fail to involve us in serious complications." But this Clarke amendment, with the specific promise which we all feel would not be kept, is the essential part of the measure. The Filipinos need not be assured again that we intend to grant them independence when our trust is fulfilled. They know that. The congressional fight is for the Clarke amendment, which its advocates still hope to force through.

The whole measure should be discarded. Legislation for the Philippines should be postponed until there is time to spare to consider it seriously in the right spirit. The object of this bill is wholly political. It is designed to undo the good constructive work done in the islands under three Republican administrations. Brig. Gen. McIntyre and Mr. Shuster have shown us that the Filipinos are doing very well under present conditions, and the question of their future development should not be treated from a partisan point of view.

[New York City Post, Apr. 28, 1916.]

Refusal of 25 Representatives to be bound by the Democratic caucus on the Philippines bill probably means a modification of a clause which does not vitally affect the principles on which the measure is founded. There is a bare possibility that the measure will pass in its present form. But everything points to an extension of the time within which definite independence is guaranteed, especially as no one is particularly opposed to such extension. Delegate QUEZON has stated that he sees no necessity for setting so short a limit on American tenure; Representative JONES, author of the bill, cheerfully admits that the period of 2 to 4 years fixed by the bill may have to be extended to 5 or 10. The essential thing is that we make a categorical promise of independence, and that we set in motion the machinery of greater self-government which will better prepare the islanders for it. As originally drafted, the bill set no definite date whatever. It is already certain that the American people will not wait the 25 years or more that DAVENPORT and others are clamoring for. Congress will also doubtless take time to knock out the ridiculous amendment to make the Philippines prohibition territory, a product of the same ignorance of insular conditions that drafted a similar measure for Porto Rico.

[Boston Traveler, May 2, 1916.]

MAKING IT INNOCUOUS.

Four Massachusetts Democrats in the National House had the courage of their convictions and the strength to resist administration pressure when they voted last night against the Clarke amendment authorizing independence for the Philippines in four years. They were Representatives GALLIVAN, OLNEY, PHELAN, and TAGUE.

The Philippines problem is a genuine one, but the Clarke amendment would not have lessened it. If the islands must be abandoned, and there are many good citizens who feel that a scuttle policy is in order, let them not be abandoned to anarchy. What Mexico is, the Philippines would be on a worse scale, if that be possible, should the United States relinquish its hold on the islands without transferring control to some other competent guardian of the peace.

Those who know the islands and the islanders know that they are not and will not for years be ready for self-government. The most intelligent among them prefer government by the United States to perpetual misgovernment by rival factions. Our little brown brothers may be longing for "freedom," but the loud noises are made by native politicians. The Jones bill, without the Clarke amendment, is innocuous.

[Boston Journal, May 2, 1916.]

DROPPING A BAD POLICY.

Last night's vote in the House dooming the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill is assurance that the United States is to make no rash promises to the Filipinos. The Clarke amendment, proposing withdrawal of American government from the Philippines four years hence, made the bill an abject policy of scuttle. With that provision the bill stood as a notice to the world that the United States was afraid to hold the Philippines.

The pretense of granting independence to the Filipinos on altruistic grounds fell flat long ago. Yesterday Representative JONES, author of the bill, declared on the floor of the House that "it would be impossible to successfully defend the islands against any first-class military and naval power."

It is true that the United States has reason to fear its inability to defend the Philippines. And it is true that our ideals of freedom pledge us always to do our part for political liberty.

But when the United States begins to retreat because of weakness and fear, American prestige takes a long tumble. And when our ideals of freedom go so far astray as to grant independence to a people unfit for self-government, our judgment is no longer to be trusted by the neighbors upon whom we depend for our reputation as a discreet guardian of the New World's interests.

[Boston Post, May 3, 1916.]

OUR PHILIPPINES.

The problem of administration of our exterior possession acquired through the War with Spain surely demands time for its solution. This is secured by the action of the House of Representatives at Washington in refusing to consent to the so-called Clarke amendment fixing a period of four years for the continuance of our sovereignty. The measure now goes to the Senate for agreement as a substitute proposition.

What is the difference between the two legislative bodies? It is simply that of foresight as to the development of conditions of autonomy in these islands. The Philippines form an obligation forced upon us through our conflict with Spain; there is no definite term of years in which they may acquire the capacity of self-government, as we understand it. Their ultimate independence must depend upon the success of their experiment in free government as we have directed it.

How can we tell when this qualification will be reached? The bill as it now stands omits the declaration of any date when success in this endeavor shall be regarded as attained. In other words, it reiterates the promise of ultimate independence when the Filipinos shall demonstrate their capacity for self-government. We must be the judges of this.

What more can safely be pledged by the United States?

[Boston, Mass., Transcript, Apr. 27, 1916.]

The revolt of the Kentuckians, Bostonians, and New Yorkers represents the Democratic sober second thought with regard to a policy which would mean the abandonment of a great national responsibility and the relegation to anarchy and destruction of a country which is now prosperous and peaceful.

[Boston (Mass.) Record, May 2, 1916.]

The Philippine bill's defeat in the House is significant in its demonstration of a weakening of the President's hold upon his party. The Republicans, objecting particularly to the mischievous Clarke amendment, were solidly against the bill. In yesterday's vote 30 Democrats joined with the Republicans in condemning it. The bill had the unqualified indorsement of the President. In a straight issue of the President's policy in the Philippines his own party has failed him. The indication of disintegration of the President's authority in the Democratic Congress is inescapable.

[Philadelphia Public Ledger, May 3, 1916.]

NO SCUTTLING IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Various objections might still be raised to the Philippines bill as passed by the House, but the elimination of the Clarke amendment relieves it of its worst feature. By the action of 30 Democrats in joining with the Republicans the responsibility solemnly assumed by the United States will not be repudiated, and the islands will not be cut adrift before their people are fit for self-government. Why the administration so urgently desired to ignore these particular obligations of the "humanity" to which it is constantly professing allegiance there is no need to inquire. It has pressed the policy of scuttle upon the Democratic Party in the most persistent and eager fashion. This makes the revolt of so considerable a section of that party in Congress a serious affair. The President committed himself to the defeated amendment by exercising every kind of personal pressure, and for that reason his prestige suffers in proportion. But this is not the main point. A shameful sacrifice of national honor, a cowardly evasion of duty, has been averted by those Members of the House whom even the demands of party harmony could not intimidate.

[Philadelphia Inquirer, May 7, 1916.]

WE REMAIN IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Well, yes; there is one thing that Congress has done. It has determined—or, rather, the House has—that the United States will remain in the Philippines for an indefinite time to come. Of course any subsequent session can upset the kettle of fish, but the whole question has been so thoroughly discussed and the consensus of opinion is so pronounced that it is unlikely that the policy of scuttle will again be forced to the front in the near future.

The Philippine Islands had not known the meaning of the word independence when we took them from Spain in 1898. Since then we have been engaged in a genuine task of uplift. We have carried enlightenment and education, development and prosperity. The work is by no means completed. But for some reason the Senate decided to unload the islands, to withdraw from any control over them in from two to four years, to make an independent nation out of a people not prepared for independence.

Should this be done, the fate of the Philippines would be a sorry one. Revolutions would spring up. Mexicanization would be certain, and annexation by Japan or some other country probable.

[Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, Apr. 28, 1916.]

DEFEATING THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

The 28 Democrats who served notice that they would not be bound by their party caucus in their action on the Philippine bill, with its bogus promise of independence within four years, can defeat that measure if the Republican minority is reasonably solid against the bill, as it undoubtedly will be.

Without the Clarke amendment, which is but a revival of the original purpose of the Jones bill, the measure would be far less objectionable. Its renewed assurance of ultimate but indefinite independence is not necessary and might better be left unsaid because of its liability to misinterpretation by native agitators.

But the promise of American abdication within four years, which is not absolute but condition, if fulfilled, would be an act of scuttling which attracts an extraordinary measure of support at the present time, only because of a fear of war and the confessed inability of the United States to defend its Far Eastern possessions, and such a course would be neither to the honor of the United States nor the welfare of the Filipinos. If the promise shall not be fulfilled, and the means of evasion provided in the bill shall be accepted at the end of the four-year period, there would be justifiable resentment on the part of the islanders and consequences which might be fatal to the benevolent purposes of the American Government.

[Philadelphia Inquirer, Apr. 30, 1916.]

Two sessions of the caucus were held, and while the Filipino "scuttle" was indorsed by 140 Democratic Representatives 35 opposed it and 28 refused to submit to caucus dictation. That means that the bill will have a pretty rough passage through the House, even if it does not go on the rocks, where it should go.

For of all the contemptible, cowardly propositions this plan of dumping the Filipinos overboard to sink or swim without aid is the most contemptible and cowardly that an American Congress was ever called upon to put into operation. That they would sink can not be doubted.

The bill is brutal; it ought to be beaten. When the Filipinos have been educated and trained sufficiently to govern themselves let them do so. But that time is not yet. They are not strong enough to stand alone. This great Nation has responsibilities in the Philippines, and it can not lightly cast them aside unless it is prepared to abandon the principles of humanity concerning which we have been hearing so much of late.

[Philadelphia Record, Apr. 30, 1916.]

THE FILIPINOS.

Ninety-eight Filipinos, said to be the principal agricultural land owners in two of the islands, have memorialized Congress against the enactment of the Jones bill. Previous to this memorial Mr. Yangco, one of the richest men in the islands, apparently friendly to independence, expressed the opinion in New York that a better plan would be to give the Filipinos a larger measure of self-government for 15 or 20 years, after which "we would undertake the task without apprehensions."

* * * * * * *

It is folly to make promises of what we will do in four or two years. When we are ready to let them go we can enact their independence. Why should we say now what we will do in 1920? How can we tell what will happen in the meanwhile? In 1920 we can enact their independence if we choose to. The fact is that the Jones bill leaves absolute discretion to the President, puts upon him responsibility which Congress has no right to shirk, and is a deception of the Filipinos, who imagines that it assures them of independence.

[Philadelphia Evening Telegraph, May 2, 1916.]

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

America will not confer independence upon the Philippine Islands at any time during the next four years. That is what the House of Representatives decided yesterday when it voted, by 213 to 165, to strike out the Clarke amendment to the Jones bill, extending the scope of self-government in the islands. Interest now centers in the bill's preamble which pledges the United States ultimately to turn our Asiatic possessions over to their native inhabitants.

Whether wisdom would justify this country in conferring independence upon the Filipinos within the short period set forth in the defeated Clarke amendment is a question open to honest debate. But it should be entirely possible for every candid friend of ultimate Philippine freedom to agree upon some date within the next 20 years as the time when the Republican and Democratic Parties' pledges to withdraw would be realized.

Ability is born of responsibility. The best school of self-government is actual participation in self-government. And the most sobering influence America could possibly exert upon the Filipino would be to assert definitely that on a given future date this country would release the Philippines, provided the inhabitants had by that time shown a genuine capacity to manage their own affairs.

[Paterson (N. J.) Press Guardian, May 1, 1916.]

The New York Journal of Commerce thinks the President is making a grave mistake in trying to force it through. It says:

"If the bill is defeated the President may be saved from the consequence of the mistake. If it is not, there is a chance that a different control of Congress and of the administration may undo the work before the provision for independence takes effect. Even so, serious trouble will have been caused and the difficulty of carrying on the process that has been begun will be considerably enhanced. This mistake of the President is akin to that committed with regard to Mexico, but is morally and politically more serious because of the pledge of faith and the responsibility assumed in the treaty by which the islands were acquired."

This is a fair sample of the judgment the best-informed and most judicious authorities on the Philippine question without respect of party allegiance have pronounced on this "scuttle" policy.

[Paterson (N. J.) Press, May 2, 1916.]

"ULTIMATELY," BUT NOT NOW.

The rejection of the Philippine "scuttle" bill in the House yesterday by the decisive vote of 213 to 165 probably seals its fate for this session. The vote was on the Clarke amendment to the bill as passed by the Senate. It provided for the abandonment of the islands to self-government within four years. The Senate will now have to take up the bill in a shape which promises an extension of home rule and ultimate independence, but fixes no date. This is the treatment that former President Taft and nearly all American statesmen who are familiar with conditions in the Philippines have advocated, and it probably represents the judgment of the great majority of our people.

On the proposition for immediate independence, which was strongly urged by the President, the Republicans in the House voted solidly in the negative, being reenforced by 30 Democrats. Some of this morning's papers in announcing the vote headline it as a Tammany revolt against the administration. This is not borne out by the record. While a majority of the Democratic dissenters were from New York they included three of the four Democratic Members from New Jersey—EAGAN, HAMILL, and HART—and others from Ohio, Michigan, Louisiana, Illinois, and Massachusetts. A Democratic revolt of this proportion against an administration measure which had been indorsed by the party caucus must be regarded as evidence that this measure was so singularly bad that not even the lash of party discipline could keep the Members of the party in line.

[Milwaukee (Wis.) Sentinel, May 1, 1916.]

THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

There is encouraging evidence that Congress is not to make the mistake of enacting a law by which the United States is to leave the Philippine Islands either two or four years from the passage of the Jones bill, as amended by Senator CLARKE, of Arkansas, and which passed the Senate several months ago by the deciding vote of Vice President Marshall.

The Democrats of the House caucused on the Philippine bill recently. Bitter opposition to its passage developed, and enough of the Members left the caucus to insure the defeat of the measure.

The enactment of the Jones bill as amended would be disastrous to the Filipino people, who are far from readiness for independence and ability to carry on a stable, safe, and sane government.

There is good reason for the belief, which obtains with the best-informed men in this country, as well as those in the islands, that if the Jones bill were to become law it would not take long to undo most of the good work the United States has done for those people and the islands in the last 18 years.

[Buffalo Commercial, May 2, 1916.]

SCUTTLE REPUDIATED.

The House of Representatives yesterday voted by a decisive majority that the United States should not get out of the Philippines as quickly as possible without concerning itself for the future of the islands or making any arrangements whatever for preserving their independence. In other words, the policy of scuttle which was adopted in the Senate by the casting vote of Vice President Marshall was repudiated in the lower branch of Congress.

The President was committed to this dishonorable piece of legislation. He had given his unqualified approval to the Clarke amendment, a complicated thing which provided that the protection of the United States over the islands should be withdrawn within four years, leaving them to the tender mercies of Japan, Germany, or any other nation that may wish to acquire them and has the physical power to accomplish its purpose. But for once during this administration the Democratic Party refused to follow its leader. For the first time since Mr. Wilson has been President his wishes in matters of high legislative importance were disregarded. The 30 Democrats in the House who revolted against the caucus and refused to acquiesce in the abandonment of the little brown wards of the Government to the rapacity of nations that have no respect for considerations of justice or humanity, or for the binding force of pledges and treaty obligations, are to be congratulated for their independence.

And, indeed, the passage of the Clarke amendment would have made "a scrap of paper" out of our treaty of peace with Spain, which gave up the Philippines among other possessions under the distinct pledge of the United States that it would guarantee freedom of religion, property rights, opportunity in business, and equity before the law to all the Spanish subjects in the islands. To surrender our control of the Philippines would be an open and a flagrant repudiation of the solemn convention that we made with the Government of Spain to protect the rights of a large, an intelligent, and a well-to-do element in the islands.

[Pittsburgh (Pa.) Leader, May 2, 1916.]

ANOTHER DREAM SHATTERED.

The severe defeat of the Senate Philippine bill with its Clarke amendment providing for independence in the islands and the passage of the Jones substitute, looks like an act of sanity. The bill now goes to conference, and, it is believed, the independence feature is dead to stay dead until the right time.

An impartial observer has no trouble to reach the conclusion that the administration should be pleased rather than otherwise at the turn of affairs, but the fact, according to news reports, seems to be the reverse. The President looks upon the failure of the independence program as a defeat and a stigma.

As a political maneuver, perhaps it is, but for the sake of the Government, the country interests, and the peace of the people the President should be glad that he was defeated.

The Philippines will develop into another Mexico unless human nature in the islands makes a sudden and miraculous change, which is only remote as a prospect. Until the people are better prepared for the duties that go with the hard task of keeping a stable, a self-governing organization, the odds are against them as an independent body.

The few years of drilling they have had has not, by any means, fitted them for citizenship, according to our ideas, and we should be responsible to the rest of the world for the consequences that would inevitably follow their "independence"—in the hands of a few shrewd politicians.

Our responsibility would be such that we should be bound and forced by other nations to take care of the mess we made by turning loose into the international family a group of semicivilized people. Either that or the other nations would take care of it for us in their own way, one we should not like, perhaps.

THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

Congressman ALLEN of the second district is to be congratulated on his vote against the Clarke amendment, granting independence to the Philippines within four years.

The Philippines may be a liability rather than an asset; they may constitute the most vulnerable part of our national organization, so far as the chance of war is concerned; but we went into the Philippines voluntarily; voluntarily we undertook the work of advancing civilization there. To leave the islands now, a sure prey to anarchy within and later on an equally sure prey to exploitation from without, would be a sorry performance.

The Republican minority in the House proved itself worthy of Republican traditions by voting solidly against the administration program of scuttle in the Philippines.. And 30 Democrats showed independence and common sense in opposing the Clarke amendment.

HOUSE TAKES WISE COURSE ON PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

The country is happily surprised by the defeat in the House of the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill, promising the Filipinos independence in from two to four years. Thirty Democrats refused to stand with the Wilson administration on this question, and their votes, together with the solid Republican vote, brought about the defeat of the bill.

For the Philippines the adverse vote cast yesterday was the very best service that has been rendered them since their destiny became linked with ours. BLOW TO WILSON'S POLICY.

All honor to those 30 House Democrats who refused to obey the mandate of their party caucus and joined the Republican minority in defeating the Philippine scuttle policy as contemplated in the Clarke amendment. The Senate bill as shaped by the Clarke amendment represented the administration policy, and the President had brought to bear a large amount of direct pressure in the endeavor to secure its passage through the House. It has been made apparent that the present Congress will enact no bill fixing a time limit to the stay of the United States Government in the Philippines.

WISE ACTION ON THE PHILIPPINES.

In refusing to give its approval to the Philippine bill with the amendment promising complete independence to the Philippine Islands within four years the National House of Representatives has acted wisely. Independence for the Philippine Islands is the goal toward which both the islanders and the United States should be working, but nothing is to be gained by setting a fixed date at which the United States will withdraw from the islands. On the contrary, much harm might result from enacting such a promise into law.

Powers of self-rule for the islanders should be enlarged from time to time so far as this can be done wisely. When the people of the Philippines shall actually manage their own affairs in a reasonably satisfactory way with only nominal direction from the Washington Government, the time will be at hand for the formal recognition of the republic in the Pacific. To fix a time limit on American authority before the islanders have learned to walk alone would be unjust to the islanders themselves and to all legitimate interests in the Philippines.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE MERELY DEFERRED.

The defeat in the House of the administration's Philippine independence bill, by a vote of 213 to 165, will cause no great amount of surprise, nor general regret. And this may be said without in the least committing one's self to the proposition that the United States should hold the Philippines indefinitely.

The truth of the matter is, so it seems to us, we should never have taken possession of them, in the first place; but having done so, it is a serious question whether we have any right to surrender the islands until we have thoroughly established for them a permanent and satisfactory government and fixed their future status.

GARROTING OF THE SCUTTLING BILL.

The Philippine scuttling bill was dishonest, cowardly, and hypocritical. Its final passage would have been a disgrace to Congress and a reproach to the Nation, and the House of Representatives deserves a measure of credit for killing it. But there is cause for regret in that the lower House has failed to live up to what must be the full measure of its conviction and has weakly kept alive the subject of Philippine legislation at an inopportune time, by resurrecting the Jones bill and accepting it as a small evil in lieu of a greater one.

The Jones bill, which goes to conference, is neither admirable nor justifiable; it is ancestor to the one it succeeds. Because of the nature of the preamble, this bill originally was considered an initial step toward turning the islands adrift, and was warmly supported by advocates of that course. The preamble undertakes to promise the Philippine Islands their independence at some future time, date not named, and the body of the measure has been looked upon as preparatory to such an event. The pledge, of course, is hollow and deceitful; no Congress has the power to bind a succeeding Congress to carry out its policies.

[New York Town Topics, May 4, 1916.]

The Jones bill to "scuttle" from the Philippines is dead. Peace to its ashes. The New York delegation, which can generally be counted upon to do the right thing at the right moment, gave the fatal blow. Nothing more unfortunate for the honor of this country, for the good of the Filipinos, and for the protection of American interests—made obligatory because of the legislation which had induced the immigration of Americans with their capital and business activities into the Philippine Islands—could have happened than the passage of this measure.

[Buffalo (N. Y.) News, May 4, 1916.]

FRUSTRATING THE DESERTERS' PLOT.

If the proposal to abandon the Philippines within four years were based upon any premise other than selfishness; if it were based upon anything other than an un-American hope to dodge responsibility, it might have fared better than it did when it came before the House of Representatives.

In Mr. JONES'S defense of the proposal he inadvertently voiced the real reason why we should continue our protectorate in the Philippines, especially during this time of world war when weaker nations are by common consent of the powers becoming the prey of the stronger.

Said Mr. JONES:

"Whatever may be the cost in blood and treasure in defending them (the Philippines) we shall be bound by every consideration of justice, honor, and national pride to undertake to do so if it shall be determined to hold them permanently."

Therefore, we suppose, it is the honorable course to set them adrift on the uncharted international seas before we are called upon to defend them.

This same standard of honor would invariably ostracize the individual. It would make him a creature altogether unlikable and intolerable from the viewpoint of his fellows.

The House of Representatives did well in throttling this plot of desertion.

WILSON AND HISTORY MAKING.

"It is hard to understand President Wilson's persistence in requiring Congress to pass the bill for scuttling from the Philippines, except that he is obstinate in a matter on which he has made up his mind and hates to change it." (Waterbury American.)

No, that can't be the reason. Mr. Wilson has demonstrated time and again that about the easiest thing in the world he has to do is to change his mind, of which he seems to have a liberal supply, as he never has run out of changes yet. No one knows the reason for his Philippine stand; that is, no one outside the White House. It can't be that his insistence is because of the party's platform pledge. It promised other things, and to neglect or break those has not seemed to cause any bother.

PHILIPPINES BILL LOST.

Congress has agreed not to agree upon any definite time for granting independence to the Philippine Islands. The administration has lost its fight for passage of the Philippine bill, with the Clarke amendment, which authorized independence for the islands within four years. In place of it the House has passed a bill providing for a greater measure of self-government for the Philippines. The preamble declares that it is the intention of the United States to grant independence to the islands ultimately, but no date is fixed.

No matter what our opinion might have been of the wisdom or folly of the United States for assuming responsibility for the Filipinos after the Spanish War, that responsibility was definitely assumed. The Filipinos are divided into many tribes, more or less civilized and enlightened. They are separated widely on their island homes. Only a few years ago some of them were head-hunters.

It is preposterous to assume that these children of nature will be ready for or capable of assuming entire responsibility for their government in four years, but is is quite in keeping with the true spirit of American independence to grant them larger measure of self-government as they qualify for the boon.

[Bangor (Me.) News, May 6, 1916.]

CAN WAIT A LITTLE LONGER.

Although Americans of all parties are agreed on the principle of freeing the Philippines, and our Government is committed to that principal by repeated pledges, most citizens are coming to the conclusion that this is not the time to let them go or to set a definite limit to our tenure.

It is unfortunate that a political squabble over the question should have developed at this time, when the Nation has on its hands problems far bigger calling for immediate solution. After we get rid of the Mexican incubus, after we have settled our national armament policy, after we are safely out of danger of embroilment in the European war, after our relations with Japan have been put on a permanently secure and trustworthy basis, it will be in order to thrash out the Philippine problem in the calmness and sanity that will then be possible. Any definite action on the subject now will necessarily be hasty and imperfectly planned and may bring unexpected consequences.

While the whole world is in a state of political uncertainty, the Filipinos can well afford to wait. They are being promoted toward full self-government at a rapid enough rate, anyhow, to assure them of our sincerity and inspire them with patient confidence. We owe it to them, as well as to ourselves, to defer final decision of their political fate until a fitter time comes.

KILL THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

If there ever was a measure that represented pure and unadulterated partisan bunk, it is the Philippine bill, over which the Democrats in caucus came near to a fist fight. It is supported and urged by the President, because it found place in the Democratic platform. There could be no conceivable folly that would outrun the effort to bring the Philippine Islands into the general turmoil of European and Asiatic affairs.

The merest cursory glance over the state of the Far East would lead a prudent thinker to refrain from causing unrest in the Philippines by any effort to set a definite or proximate date for the conferment of freedom upon the islanders. The same sentiment that caused deprecations of Yuan Shi Kai's assumption of imperial honors that he has now discarded, the same sentiment that caused England to defer putting home rule into effect in Ireland, should actuate this country to refuse to take action upon the Philippine measure. This rational view of the Jones bill was summed up in the resolution offered by Representative CONRY for the Tammany delegation:

"Resolved, That no action be taken on this or any other bill affecting the Philippine Islands and looking to the establishment of the independence of the same and the withdrawal of the authority of the United States therefrom until a full, fair, and complete opportunity be given for hearing to all parties interested in the islands and whose interests are to be affected by the proposed legislation."

[Chicago Herald, Apr. 29, 1916.]

The Jones-Clarke bill has been aptly described as "independence with a string." It does not democratically dismiss the islanders with guaranties for their safety against foreign aggression. It merely pretends to. And their danger from foreign aggression is real, and not wholly from Japan by any means.

It really decides nothing and provides only for continued agitation and weakness instead of for stability and strength. It "passes the buck" of responsibility for action to the President, who, if he finds it embarrassing, may pass it back to Congress, which may pass it again to the President after taking another guess.

The bald truth is that the party in power has made a mess of its efforts to settle the Philippines question. For the sake of humanity let us not make another Mexico of the Philippines. The Jones-Clarke bill is a hopeless muddle. Better drop it and try again. Better back up, begin over, and start right, with a definite conception of what we wish to do and how we are going to do it.

THE DEFEAT OF THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

While friends of President Wilson will regret that he should be defeated upon an important measure, true friends of the Philippines will be pleased that the Philippine bill, in the form in which it was voted upon in the House of Representatives last night, should have been defeated.

CONDITIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Now that the plan to quit the Philippines while our self-imposed task of fitting their people for self-government is unfinished has been abandoned, an investigation would seem to be in order to find out what should be done to improve conditions in the islands. There is reason to believe that the general situation is far less favorable than the supporters of Gov. Gen. Harrison's administration would have us believe. Gen. McIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, reported after his return from the Philippines last year that there was a practically unanimous opinion that the existing form of government was no longer meeting the needs of the islands. He found no serious demand for the withdrawal of American control, and the main ground of criticism was the lack of power in the local government to deal with questions of finance or to enact laws believed to be necessary for the development of public lands and mines.

[Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle, May 4, 1916.]

SAVED FROM DISGRACE.

The administration has had the importance of the Tammany organization impressed upon it by the action of the Tammany delegation in Congress in bolting the Philippines bill. The result was the defeat of the Senate bill, with the Clarke amendment which was designed to confer independence on the Filipinos in four years. The Jones bill of 1914, which grants the islands a larger measure of self-government, was passed in its stead.

While the motives of the Tammany delegation might not bear close inspection, being grounded on the quarrel over post-office appointments in this State, the results are eminently satisfactory to patriotic Americans. The defeated Clarke amendment would have placed upon the Government the disgrace of deliberately abandoning the Philippines to a worse condition of anarchy than that existing in Mexico at the present time, or else to become a prey to the tender mercies of any predatory or land-hungry power. In addition we should have been placed in the position of repudiating our solemn treaty obligations to Spain, by which we guaranteed religious freedom to all the inhabitants of the islands, and we should also have been guilty of bad faith toward those Americans who have invested money in the islands or have purchased Philippine bonds.

[Rochester (N. Y.) Times, Apr. 29, 1916.]

PHILIPPINE BILL IN DOUBT.

It begins to look as if the administration Philippine bill will not pass this session of Congress. We hope it will not. It is an uncalled-for piece of legislation at this time. We all may be in favor of the ultimate independence of the Philippines, but surely not until the various peoples of those islands are more fully prepared to understand the responsibilities of self-government. The Democrats in caucus the other night were not able to make the bill a party measure, including as it does the Clarke amendment providing for independence in four years.

The provision that the president must grant independence to the Philippines within four years is indefensible. It is impossible for the present Congress to determine whether the Filipinos will be fit for independence in 4, 10, or 20 years; but the bill which the President approves would not leave the question to a later Congress to decide. The Republican Senators should stand solidly against the bill.

[Washington Star, May 2, 1916.]

THE PHILIPPINES.

In rejecting by a decisive vote the Clarke amendment to the Philippine bill, the House last night performed a most important public service. The bill itself should not have been brought forward at this session. With the greater part of the world tossing in convulsions, this was not the proper time for the consideration of any phase of the Philippine question. There was no good reason why we should add anything to the anxieties and uncertainties of an unparalleled world situation.

But the Clarke amendment capped the climax of unwisdom. To propose independence for the Philippines in four years at the outside was practically to put the islands into the discussion about map changes generally. For, even if the European war should end in the near future, a notice given now of the intention of the United States to withdraw from the Philippines at so early a day as that named by the Senator from Arkansas would have caused the great powers to consider the islands, secretly if not openly, in their calculations about the future.

What induced the President to indorse the amendment is not easily understood, unless on the score of a too great pressure of business and a lack of time to digest thoroughly some of the matters presented to him. With the European question, the Mexican question, the Japanese question, and domestic questions bearing upon his campaign for reelection coming before him every day in some form, he must be a hurried and a harried man.

[Utica (N. Y.) Observer, May 3, 1916.]

WHEN THEY ARE READY.

In the days when it was customary for young people to work subject to their parents it was a very common practice to give them "a stint"—that is, to set an assigned task which they must accomplish before they might be free to go fishing, to play ball, to visit the neighboring boys or girls, or to be excused from their tasks or studies.

That is very much the way we are treating the Filipinos, and it seems to be the safest and best way that we can do. We are saying to them, by this substitute bill that has been adopted by the House, that when they are fit and able to govern themselves, when they have accomplished the task of preparing themselves for self-government, we will withdraw from the Philippine Archipelago and give them free reign. We are not saying that in one year or in four years they can have the full control of their country, for their task might not be done by that time. When they have completed their stint the government will be handed over into their complete direction.

There is a good deal of uncertainty as to the Philippines. It seems that each person who writes concerning them and each person who goes there as an investigator finds exactly what he sets out to find. Reports come on the one hand that indicate that the Filipinos are making wonderful progress toward self-government; that they are displaying capabilities; that they are honest, trustworthy, thorough, and dependable; that there is no doubt whatever, if they were given control of their government, they would keep up the high standard set and maintained under American occupation. But reports come from the other hand that as soon as given a little authority the Filipino becomes intolerable, puffed up by his own importance, neglectful of the real duties of office, and overpowered by the privilege of commanding or directing. It is said that they neglect health measures, that they are not honest in their dealing with the State, that they are quarrelsome among themselves, that they permit government property to run down, are shiftless and procrastinating, and that there is every indication that the islands would drop back into the old order of things—a disease-breeding, filthy, immoral, half-savage state.

These differing reports are given by men who have reputation for fairness and candor, and each side brings forward incidents and alleged facts to prove the contention that is set up. It is to be regretted that some one or some body of men can not make reports as to conditions in the Philippines which are unbiased by politics or sympathies.

In the absence of knowledge as to actual conditions, we believe this country will do the best thing by waiting until there seems to be a certainty that the Filipinos can establish and maintain a stable and respectable government. And it would be best, no doubt, if the integrity of its government might be assured by other nations.

The Filipino has not yet had time to get into the habit of good government. His intentions may be of the very best, but the customs of centuries of misrule and semisavagery can not be eradicated in 18 years. It is better to try him out, giving him larger opportunities, but still retaining the guiding hand and making him understand that when he accomplishes his task and brings up a generation of men who have good government ingrained through their very fiber they may have full liberty to go forth as a nation of and by themselves.

THE PHILIPPINES BILL.

The House rejected Monday the Clarke amendment to the Philippines bill granting independence to the islands in 1920, or four years hence, and, in lieu thereof, adopted the original Jones bill providing for a greater measure of self-government for the natives, at the same time declaring the purpose of the Federal Government to ultimately grant the islands complete independence, but without fixing any date for it. The defeat of the amendment has been presaged for some time. It looked some months ago as though it would go through without difficulty, for it had the support of the President and had been indorsed by the Democratic caucus. In the last few days, however, there has been a marked change of sentiment in some quarters, and serious opposition developed in the South on the ground that the independence of the Philippines would mean a considerable loss of business in cotton goods.

But while this argument to commercial advantage may have accounted for some votes in opposition, the real explanation lies in the disturbed condition in Europe, the East, and Mexico. It was seen that if present conditions are maintained four years hence it would be a grave mistake to turn the archipelago loose, then to try its fortunes in a world filled with war and disturbances, and with so much unsettlement as to the international obligations. It meant, as many of the papers pointed out, the possibility of trouble on our part with some of the neighboring countries, who might think this a favorable opportunity to seize the islands; or even if it did not, it would probably tend to produce the Mexicanization of the country, if the natives were not equal to administering its affairs, about which there is a wide difference of opinion among those who ought to know the islands and their people best. Moreover, there is a strong sentiment as to the advisability of the present Congress legislating for another Congress, to be elected four years hence, instead of leaving the decision of the matter to the Senate and House in power in 1920. As a matter of fact, there is not the faintest conception of what the situation will be then, and he is indeed a marvelous prophet who can foretell so many years what the condition in the Pacific will be in 1920.

Only the other day the House first, and afterwards the Senate, put its foot down on this proposition to decide to-day a question to come up in regard to sugar, and declared against fixing a specific date when sugar would be placed on the free list, pointing out how unwise this is and how much better to leave the matter open to Congress to act on it whenever the occasion is deemed favorable. This is a policy which ought always to be pursued, and the country would have been saved many troubles and complications had it always been followed. Had the House fixed 1920 definitely for Filipino independence and a subsequent Congress found that this was greatly against public policy and likely to involve us in complications with foreign countries, and repealed the law as against public policy, it would have stirred up the natives, and with cause—and we would have faced charges of breach of faith and probably a general uprising, whereas there is nothing to prevent Congress from granting independence in 1920 should it deem the conditions then favorable. The extension of the powers of the natives will teach them self-government better, and the fact that this independence is assured whenever they are deemed capable of administering their affairs properly will encourage them in their efforts to improve themselves.

Exactly how long it is going to take them to reach the condition that will entitle them to independence it is difficult to say, as there are such wide variations in the views taken and such differences as to what is to be expected. Some of the extremists would have the natives reach the educational and political status of the American. It is doubtful if they ever do so; or that a government administered on the American model would suit the Filipinos. It is probable that there will always be some disagreement on this point, but the promise made of ultimate independence for the islands and the greater measure of administration granted the natives hold out the promise that a settlement of this vexed problem will soon come. The fact that the Democratic Party has promised this at as early a day as possible is further assurance on this point.

[Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, May 4, 1916.]

A PLEDGE TO THE FILIPINOS.

The best part of the Philippine bill remains after the elimination of the Clarke amendment. The amendment specified that the island Archipelago should be given freedom in four years. Its elimination leaves the preamble of the measure which pledges the word of the Government that the Philippines shall ultimately be granted their independence without specifying a date.

It has been accepted from the beginning by both parties that the Filipinos should not remain permanent wards of the United States. The islands were taken as a trust, to be administered in the interests of their inhabitants and in time turned over to them to become an independent nation. How long this task of training a dependent people to the stature of independence would take no one could tell. Until the Clarke amendment was framed no one apparently had attempted to fix a time.

For 18 years the islands have been under the control of the United States. That the natives have made much progress toward fitness for freedom in this period no one will deny. Successive degrees of self-government have been conferred on them. They have not proved either unresponsive or irresponsible, but have accepted their new liberties with gravity and utilized them with profit.

It is high time for the United States to put itself definitely on record as pledging the Filipinos their independence when they shall have shown their capability. No American would cut them adrift under conditions inviting disaster; no American, however much he may have been opposed to taking the islands in the first place, has any other idea now than to do what is right and best for the islands.

This preamble to the Philippine bill puts into the form of law a settled American conviction—that the ultimate destiny of the Filipinos is to form an independent nation founded upon principles instilled into their minds by American teachers, generals, and statesmen and adhered to under successive administrations at Washington. The promise ought to be satisfactory to islanders honestly desirous that the Filipino independence day shall not too long be delayed, for liberty without adequate preparation for liberty would be a disaster.

[Springfield (Mass.) Republican, April 30, 1916.]

THE DANGER TO THE PHILIPPINE BILL.

The Philippine bill should not be lost entirely because the Clarke independence amendment adopted by the Senate arouses keen opposition in the House. It is a well-considered measure for extending the principles of self-government, aside from the provision stipulating that independence should be granted not later than four years from its enactment, unless the President, in his discretion, should then refer the question back to Congress for reconsideration. Some Republicans in the Senate voted for the bill; some even voted for the independence amendment. The bill in some form should become law at this session.

One of the worst examples of American statesmanship in our history was the acquisition of the Philippine Islands: it was a blunder for which politicians, publicists, and financiers of the imperialist and militarist type were personally responsible. They posed as wise men with vision, and they loaded the United States with a distant dependency of orientals which the United States is positively incapable of defending. If there is any honorable way of cutting the connection between the Philippine Islands and the United States it should be done before military "preparedness" in this country develops a cockiness concerning the future of China and Japan's ambitions to develop a Monroe doctrine of the Orient that would bring us into military collision with the one rising imperial power of the Far East.

So the conference report was agreed to.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I now move that the Senate proceed to a consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill 15455.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries, to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the adoption of the conference report is a matter of very considerable importance, and I desire to inform the Senate that the Delegate from the Philippine Islands has just told me that this action is of greater importance to the Philippine people than anything that has happened in 350 years of the existence of that nation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not think that the Delegate from the Philippine Islands can give the Senate much instruction on that point. In opposition to his views I think the action just taken by the Senate is very unfortunate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope the Delegate from the Philippine Islands will appreciate the fact that the preamble in the bill which has just been passed is nothing more than a parchment declaration carrying out a provision in a party platform, and that it will have no more effect than the declarations of the Democratic platforms during the last 16 years, so far as the independence of the Philippines is concerned.

Mr. President, I have taken considerable time with reference to the shipping bill. However, I think I have confined my remarks pretty closely to the bill. What I have to say now will be with reference to an amendment which I expect to offer to the bill, and to which I really do not anticipate any objection on the part of the Senator having the bill in charge. It is a matter to which I have given more consideration since I submitted my remarks the other day; and the more I have investigated it, the more important it seems to me to be. So I have decided to trespass upon the time of the Senate a little further to present some facts with reference to it which may be of some service, at any rate hereafter, and if the amendment should be accepted as a part of the bill it will offer some suggestions to the shipping board for their guidance.

Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk an amendment which I expect to propose when the section in the bill is reached defining the powers of the shipping board. I ask that the proposed amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. In section 13, page 13, line 3, after the word "registry," it is proposed to insert the following:

It shall examine the rules under which vessels are constructed abroad and in the United States, and the methods of classifying and rating same, and they shall examine into the subject of marine insurance, the number of companies in the United States, domestic and foreign, engaging in marine insurance, the extent of the insurance on hulls and cargoes placed or written in the United States, and the extent of reinsurance of American maritime risks in foreign companies, and ascertain what steps may be necessary to develop an ample marine insurance system as an aid in the development of a merchant marine.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in all of the many-sided phases of the discussion of the shipping question, which is a question that never will be settled until it is settled right, there is a feature of it, largely fundamental and basic in its character, that rarely or never is touched upon nowadays, and which has been given very little, if any, consideration in the discussion thus far on this bill. I refer to marine insurance. How it is that this phase of our maritime interests has received so little attention I do not know, unless it be that American marine insurance companies seem to be as unequal to the covering and the carrying of American maritime risks as American ships seem unequal to the carrying of American imports and exports. It may have been felt that our marine insurance business is of such comparative little consequence, as it is felt by too many that our maritime interests themselves are of such comparatively little consequence, as to merit but little attention, and especially when these feeble and struggling interests are pitted against the powerful and prosperous foreign maritime interests now dominating our foreign carrying, it has become the custom to disregard the American and give deferential consideration to the competing foreign maritime interests.

Mr. President, when an American investor in an American ship first considers such an investment, the first thing he has to think of and provide for is the insurance of his vessel, and she must be so built, classed, and rated that not only will his vessel enjoy insurance at the minimum of premium rates but the same must be true of the cargoes his vessel carries. If he is to be able to command as good freight rates as his rivals, his ship must enjoy as low insurance rates, as must the cargoes his ship carries. At the very outset, therefore, this matter of the insurance of hulls and cargoes becomes a vital factor in the success of the ship during her entire life, not only as a ship but as a carrier of cargoes.

It is right here that the would-be American investor is confronted with a condition of insufficiency, of weakness, in his own country that forces him, actually forces him, to go abroad, and usually to England, in order to make sure that his ship and her cargoes shall enjoy the minimum of insurance rates. On the very threshold of his investment in a ship, an American is confronted with the necessity of depending upon Great Britain. If he depends upon the instrumentalities existing in the United States to assure him the minimum rates of insurance, immediately he becomes involved in difficulties and his ship and her cargoes are likely to be subject to discriminations that place them at a disadvantage with their foreign competitors. This situation makes the standardization suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] very doubtful and delusive.

If, for example, the American starts out to build his ship in conformity with the rules of the American Bureau of Shipping, the institution in this country analogous to the British Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, and his ship is classed and rated in the "Record" of the American bureau, what happens? With this American certificate of strong and safe construction in his possession, with his vessel possessing the highest class and rating known, he proceeds to secure from American marine insurance companies insurance equal to the investment he has in his ship. If his ship is one that runs up toward a million dollars in cost—and it is not an unusual ship nowadays that costs a million dollars—he finds that there are not enough American marine insurance companies to cover his risk. It is the practice of insurance companies to reinsure considerable amounts of the risks they assume in other companies, so as to avoid concentrating their losses. It is quickly found necessary, to secure full insurance for this new and high-class American-built ship, that he must go abroad, preferably to London, to secure the marine insurance required on his ship.

As soon as this American vessel owner's application for insurance is received in London, the London insurance company, or Lloyd's insurance representatives, turn at once to the book issued by the British Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping to see what class and rating the ship has that is applying for insurance for herself and, possibly, for her cargo as well; and easily the cargo may be as valuable, or even more valuable, than the vessel herself.

If the new American ship is not classed and rated in Lloyd's Book, at once trouble begins, and his ship is at a disadvantage. He must have her classed in Lloyd's to secure British insurance, and he finds that he must have British insurance. He finds that to conform to Lloyd's requirements sufficiently to acquire first class is, generally speaking, more troublesome and expensive than if he had in the first case built his ship to conform to Lloyd's rules of construction rather than to the rules of the American Bureau of Shipping. Thereafter the experienced American vessel owner is pretty apt to avoid initial trouble, at least, by always building the ships he has built according to Lloyd's—according to British—rules of construction rather than to American rules.

The lack of a sufficiency of American marine-insurance companies to cover fully the risks involved forces the American vessel owner in the very beginning of his career as a vessel owner to find that he is better off doing business with the British Lloyd's than with the institution that in the United States performs all of the functions that are performed by Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping. He finds that his own country is at a disadvantage, and at once he finds that England is at an advantage in the pursuit of maritime business. Instead of engendering a respect for his own country, instead of his national pride being stimulated by what he finds, quite the reverse is true; he quickly acquires a feeling of indifference for his own country, and to the extent that he possesses a sentimental pride in his Americanism he quickly learns to suppress it and finally to lose it.

Need it be doubted that this has a very strongly deterring effect upon the investment of American capital in American-built vessels for foreign trade? When an investor in this country finds that he is doing the unusual thing or going about the investment in an unusual way, the natural timidity that capital always feels is felt in this investor, and more times than not he abandons the idea of investing in American ships. It is easy to persuade such a man, especially if sentimentality is not strong in his business make-up, to invest in foreign ships—in British ships under the British flag—ships that he finds there exists a preference for in all the ports of the world, which makes it so much easier for her to secure cargoes, and profitable ones at that.

If this American citizen is of an inquiring turn of mind, what else does he find? He finds that the British Government is friendly to and lends its aid and encouragement to the building of ships in Great Britain and to ownership of them under the British flag. He finds that, in Great Britain, a shipowner is a respectable citizen, a subject who is esteemed and regarded, in a way, as one of the pillars of the British Empire. In his own country this American investigator finds his Government distinctly unfriendly; he finds the press—the great majority of the newspapers—distinctly suspicious of him; in short, he finds himself more or less under a ban, some one to be watched, some one whose tendencies are sinister. All sorts of obstacles arise in his business pathway instead of the way being smoothed for him. And the laws he is subjected to, his vessel property is subjected to, and the severity of the regulations to which his vessel property is subjected, all have a tendency to make him apologetic of himself, because of the business in which he is engaged; quickly he takes on the manners of a man placed at a disadvantage. The very home atmosphere in which an American shipowner lives is conducive to the sapping of his self-respect.

The wonder is not, in these circumstances, which are real and have a very decisive influence upon American shipowners, that there are so few of him—the real wonder is that there are any of him at all! The bill under consideration simply emphasizes this condition of things. Before we get an American merchant marine upon the seas we begin imposing restrictions and handicapping and circumscribing him in his efforts at competition abroad. Instead of encouraging, we are hampering and preventing him.

There is very good reason for believing that the American Bureau of Shipping, which formulates rules for the construction of ships, has better rules, and ships built to conform to them are better ships and safer ships than are the ships built under Lloyd's rules. It is natural that this should be so, and an explanation of why this is so is deserving of record. The American Bureau of Shipping is controlled by the marine-insurance interests of the United States, the interests concerned in seeing that ships are built strong and safe, because the stronger and the safer the ships are built the less actual risk the insurance companies have to take in insuring such ships and their cargoes, and this makes for reduced marine insurance, if there were companies enough in this country to carry all of the maritime risks that arise in this country. It so happens, too, that the same reasons that would influence insurance companies to see that the maximum of safety is sought in the building of ships are the reasons that the Government and the public as well would have—the greater safety of life and property afloat under the American flag. There are shipowning and shipbuilding interests, too, that share in the control of the American Bureau of Shipping, but these are subordinate to the insurance interests. The shipowning and shipbuilding interests are able to prevent too rigid, too exacting, or unnecessary requirements in the building of ships, but the controlling interests in the institution in this country which formulates rules for the building of ships are interests supremely concerned in the construction being safe and strong—the very interests that assume the risks of the vessels' operations and the risks on the cargoes they carry.

In the British Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, on the other hand, the insurance interests are the subordinate interests; merchants and shipowners are the dominant interests, a condition that would naturally have a trend toward lightness of construction.

Mr. President, this suggestion may be denied by some, but in my judgment it will be found under the facts that it is true, and also based upon good reasons; that is, such reasons as animate people in the promotion of their own interests. It will be obvious that for every ton of material that is omitted from the construction of a ship the ship will be able to carry an additional ton of cargo—and this will be true all during the life of the ship. The ship is built, as a rule, to carry cargoes, and the larger the cargoes she can carry the more money she will earn. So, on the part of the owner, while it is to his interest to have a ship built that will be able to stand the stress of use, there is, nevertheless, a tendency on his part to secure the maximum carrying capacity with the minimum expense. Lightness of construction, therefore, within the required factors of safety would better serve the financial interests of the owner than a construction where the factor of safety is especially high. Not so, however, the insurance companies, nor the shippers of freight, nor the travelers on the vessels; naturally not so the Government. Builders, for their own reputations, would prefer to build ships that would endure, and without frequent need of large repairs or reconstruction, however profitable to builders repairs and reconstruction may be. But the influence of the owner, naturally, is a dominant influence, and his trend has been described. If, however, the owner realizes that the insurance interests, upon which he must depend to indemnify him and his cargoes against loss, insist upon a higher factor of safety, the persuasive influence of a high factor of safety becomes controlling.

I do not know enough about the technical side of the business to be able to explain in detail its ramifications or the reasons for them. But this I do know, that by far the greater number of vessels building in the United States to-day for ocean navigation are being built under Lloyd's rules, and the vessels will be classed and rated in Lloyd's book, and the owners of the vessels, and the owners of cargoes the vessels carry, will have no difficulty in securing insurance at Lloyd's—in London—and they will be indifferent to or disregardful of the precise extent to which their ships and their cargoes may secure insurance in the United States.

Mr. President, these are matters that should be considered in the building up of an American merchant marine, especially for foreign trade. These, surely, are matters that will deserve the most critical and careful attention of the Federal shipping board, when it comes into being and begins to exercise its functions, especially the functions of investigation into the handicaps in the way of an American merchant marine and the essential accessories in the United States to the building up of an American merchant marine.

From almost every angle that the matter may be viewed, therefore, the advantages in construction are with the British Lloyd's. There are other factors favorable to Lloyd's not yet touched upon. One of them may, pardonably, be explained in brief detail. As everybody knows, British ships cover the seven seas; they are found in all the ports of the world; they are the most conspicuous, because they are by far the most numerous, ships engaged in foreign trade. In the most remote port of the world a representative of Great Britain will be found, and usually a representative of British Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping. But if the latter is not in evidence, the representative of the British Government is "on the job" and he is just as alert to serve and promote and secure a preference for a British ship as if he were the owner of her, or the representative of Lloyd's, in which, generally speaking, she will be found classed and rated, and upon class and rating insurance of cargoes and hulls is based. The book of Lloyd's is in that remote place; the alert official is there to safeguard the British ship.

It is quite needless to say that there are none of the agencies, none of the representatives in the remote, or even in the more important, ports of the world to advance, promote, safeguard, and foster the interests of an American ship. What wonder that the British ship is dominant? What wonder that the American ship is unknown? Lloyd's book tells all that it is needed to know regarding a British ship, wherever she is, and, wherever she is, there is sure to be the book of Lloyd's to tell all about her. Everything is awkward and difficult with the American ship not built according to Lloyd's rules and classed in Lloyd's book, necessitating lengthy cables at large cost, much delay, and usually an inferior freight rate because of a higher insurance rate. Need we wonder at the decline of the American ship so circumstanced? And is it not manifest, therefore, how important an item that of insurance is in the building up of the American merchant marine?

During a discussion on this floor, Mr. President, when the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill was under consideration, on June 21, 1894, the late Senator Frye, of Maine, had endeavored to secure the restoration of the old American policy of discriminating duties for the protection and upbuilding of American shipping in foreign trade, by the repeal of hampering laws and the abrogation of terminable trade treaties then, as now, in the way. In the course of his remarks Senator Frye said, in part:

> How much tonnage have we to-day in the foreign carrying trade? In 1810 we had 1,000,000 tons, and were carrying 93 per cent of our exports and imports. To-day we have 938,000 tons, about 100,000 tons less than we had in 1810; and to-day, instead of carrying 93 per cent, we are carrying but 12 per cent of our exports and imports, and are paying Great Britain $175,000,000 every year to do our carrying trade for us.

At this point Senator Frye was interrupted by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who inquired:

> If it would not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him, in this connection, if Great Britain has not pursued by indirection the same methods—that is, by rates of insurance at Lloyd's, and by premiums on iron ships—of discriminating in favor of her own tonnage down to the present day?

To this Senator Frye replied:

> Mr. President, the most persistent, continued effort on the part of Great Britain to prevent our vessels getting any of the carrying trade has been pursued always, from the very beginning down to now. The Lloyd's will rate our vessels second rate when they ought to be rated even above a first-class British ship to-day, and the Lloyd's control the entire marine insurance of the world, at any rate, so far as that of Great Britain and the United States are concerned. Their companies are controlling all the marine insurance in our country, and are discriminating against our vessels.

Senator Perkins, of California, an experienced seaman and a large shipowner, interrupted at this point to observe:

> It has been shown to-day in debate that England will not permit salt to be carried from England to the East Indies from her own provinces in any other vessels except those of English build and flying the English flag.

Other Senators joined in the discussion, and the remarks they made showed that it was then well understood that the methods employed by the British Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, by Lloyd's Insurance, and by the British Government, all worked to a common end to discriminate against high-class, thoroughly seaworthy, extremely well-built American ships, and in favor of British ships.

The dislocation of the world's foreign commerce at the outbreak of the European war was not due to a lack of merchant ships; but it was due to a lack of security regarding insurance both of ships and their cargoes. Ships were lying up, one after another, in neutral ports, and freight was accumulating and congesting the warehouses and piers and the railroad sidings for many miles, merely because owners of ships and owners of cargoes were uncertain where they could obtain insurance, and how reliable the insurance was that they might have or obtain.

Imagine a case, if you please—by no means an impossible one, however much we may hope it is improbable—of our having difficulties with Great Britain, or Great Britain having difficulties with other nations, that would withdraw from our ships and their cargoes the usual marine insurance facilities that so freely they now possess through reliance upon British companies. It would, until time had been taken to adjust the matter, operate just the same as though we had no ships. The world seems not to have taken seriously to heart the great cessation in merchant shipbuilding in Great Britain, the past two years, due to the materials and men usually employed in merchant shipbuilding being diverted to war shipbuilding. A time might easily come, and a condition might easily arise, where we could no longer depend upon Great Britain for our merchant ships, and this is the time we choose to sow the seed of the destruction of American shipbuilding. We propose placing both our foreign and domestic commerce in a condition of such utter dependence upon Great Britain as to enable her to give it complete strangulation whenever she so decrees. And we flatter ourselves that Great Britain "would never do that."

To discuss the methods employed by Britons to advance their maritime interests, to hold their maritime power, is not, necessarily, to criticize them. Britons are justified in availing of whatever resources are at their command to enable them to retain in their own possession supremacy in so potential an instrument in world dominance as merchant shipping. Criticism should rather be leveled against the nation that neglects to avail itself of the resources within its possession to further, to strengthen, and to maintain its maritime interests. No nation is so deserving of criticism in this respect as the United States. The neglect of its maritime interests by the United States creates the opportunities that the maritime rivals of the United States avail themselves of and make the most of. Those nations are to be commended for taking advantage of this condition rather than to be criticized.

Insurance, both of vessels and their cargoes, is one of the most powerful leverages that a nation can use with which to establish, promote, maintain, defend, and safeguard its maritime interests. If this Nation fails to avail itself of its own means for insuring its merchant ships and the cargoes they carry, and especially if it accepts dependence upon foreign insurance of its ships and their cargoes, this Nation throws wide open a door that its foreign rivals may enter—unquestionably will enter—for taking advantage of our situation for the benefit of their native shipping.

The people in the United States have talked in favor of an American merchant marine in foreign trade, the press has preached an American merchant marine, and Congress has all the while made it more and more difficult for an American merchant marine to succeed in foreign trade. It looks as if we are going to continue this in the passage of the bill which is now pending.

The press favors an American merchant marine, but it is against American shipowners and American shipbuilders, and thus it has created in the minds of the people a suspicion that American shipbuilders and shipowners are bands of unmuzzled thieves, with minds intent upon the National Treasury, and eager to get their hands and arms down deep in the Nation's gold for the support of their industry. Nothing is more monstrously untrue than this. Nevertheless, a large portion of the press treat American shipbuilders and shipowners as if this were literally true, as if it were necessary for the press constantly to put the Nation upon its guard against the wiles and schemes of American shipowners and shipbuilders. How easy it has been, thus fortified, for Congress constantly to draw tighter the restrictions and harassments to which it subjects American shipowners and shipbuilders. How natural that Congress should look coldly upon suggestions, especially when advanced by American shipowners and shipbuilders, for the upbuilding of an American merchant marine in foreign trade.

Is it to be supposed that our maritime rivals, possessing, as they do, a thorough and keen appreciation of the naval and economic value of a merchant marine, ready as most of them are to promote a merchant marine of their own by generous aid and liberal laws—is it to be supposed that they are blind to the attitude which has grown up in the United States toward American shipbuilders and American shipowners? On the contrary, what more natural than that they should, in every way in their power, help to fan and keep alive the suspicion, the distrust, that is so widespread throughout the United States toward its shipowners and its shipbuilders? We voluntarily create a condition that gives only the required opportunity for our foreign rivals to take advantage of. Should we be surprised when they do take advantage of it? Should we not, rather, be surprised if they should neglect to take advantage of the opportunities we thus create for them?

Insurance, as I have said, is a most potent instrument for the promotion of a nation's marine—insurance of both vessels and their cargoes. As things are to-day, in the United States, there are not enough marine insurance companies, or companies doing marine insurance, to carry all of the risks incident to the operation of ships and the cargoes they carry. Shipowners and shippers are compelled to resort to foreign insurance companies to carry the larger part of their marine insurance.

Should we be surprised to learn, then, that British methods, customs, practices, all favor British-built ships in competition with other ships? Rather should we not be surprised if these customs and methods did not favor British-built ships to the very utmost? How else, indeed, could British maritime supremacy be maintained than through the jealous care, the careful fostering, the generous promotion of everything designed to favor British, as compared with other shipping? The British Government and the British people, no less than the British press, are in complete accord on these heads. Britain's shipping is the very apple of her eye; and all Britons feel, and they feel deeply, that no sacrifice is too great for Great Britain as a nation, and Britons as a people, to make to safeguard and promote British shipping. If we look the situation and the facts critically in the eye, we need not wonder that Great Britain is to-day supreme upon the seas, and that we are weak upon the seas.

Probably no American author of recent years has more thoroughly understood the British attitude toward British shipping and toward the rivals of British shipping than the late Capt. William W. Bates, who was commissioner of navigation during the administration of President Harrison, and who subsequently wrote two notable volumes on the subject, under the titles of "American Marine" and "American Navigation." In the last-named volume Capt. Bates, who was one of the most scientific and experienced shipbuilders this country ever produced, discussed the insurance feature of the case at great length, with a wealth of detail that showed complete familiarity with his subject. From that volume I quote very briefly:

Insurance dependency and its evils: Ten years ago, when writing his work on American marine, the author thoroughly examined the marine insurance business in the United States. He had previously, as United States Commissioner of Navigation, with the assent of the Secretary of the Treasury, asked for reports from collectors of customs, which were made by letters from the best insurance authorities at the different ports. These letters agreed upon a very important point, that foreign insurance companies for many years had been squeezing American companies out of business, and this pressure continues. British companies constitute the bulk of the invading army, but other nations, even the Chinese, occupy places in its ranks.

So, we find, American insurance companies as well as American ships have been "squeezed out of business" by their foreign rivals—the tail eventually going with the hide. This is a subject manifestly that should be gone into in thorough detail by some authoritative American body, and the facts should be spread throughout the country when they are obtained. Here is a case where the public needs precise and authoritative knowledge, and it should receive it. Continuing my quotation from Capt. Bates:

The constant breaking in and destruction of our insurance lines is one of the worst things transpiring for the maintenance of a commercial marine. Foreign insurance companies are like so many birds of prey. They do, and always will, prefer to cover the shipping and commerce of their fatherland. Partiality goes with their allegiance. Foreign underwriters can not equally serve our Nation and their own. No wise nation will commit its commerce to the insurance powers of rival countries, because to trust any but its own people is to be betrayed at last. Every one of these agencies, to gain popularity at home, must be watchful of opportunities to make advantages for their own nation. We may as well have our shipyards closed as our insurance offices shut up, since we should expect the same result to follow, namely, helpless foreign dependence in a vital branch of industry. It is only needful to know the little of the history that we have already presented of their adroit handling of our own trade and transportation to understand fully if we remain, as we have become, dependent on the British Lloyd's and other English underwriters for marine insurance that our competition with British shipping is at an end, now and forever, unless Congress enacts strict regulations for marine insurance, with penalties for their execution.

It is not to be doubted that this is a matter that the Government should look into at the earliest opportunity and in the most thorough manner. Listen to this from this expert on the subject:

There is not to-day a single port in our country where foreign companies control the rates of marine insurance—that sees justice done to American vessels. Every schedule of rates is fixed in the interest of foreign navigation. Of late it has seemed that a considerable export trade in coal may develop to ports in Europe. The papers tell of the building of wooden schooners of a large size to engage in this trade. Will they secure it? Foreign insurance companies will in due time answer this question in the negative, as they have answered the question of cotton, grain, and provision carriage. That is to say if Congress shall permit.

How many of us knew that foreign countries control our rates of marine insurance?—

Congress, in all probability, has permitted, but Congress may in time cease to permit. It is a fact that it is difficult for some people to understand that British ships, which cost more to operate than it costs to operate the ships of any other country save the United States, have been able to seize and to retain control of the world's carrying. It would seem that we look far too much upon the surface and burrow far too little beneath the surface, and, manifestly, there is much to be discovered if we will investigate thoroughly, especially off from the beaten tracks of investigation into the byways, at least as thoroughly as into the highways. A little more of Capt. Bates is wholesome:

The regulation of underwriting: It will not be disputed that marine insurance is a branch of commerce. It is bought, sold, imported, and exported, and is regarded as a "chose" in action. The regulation of this business is therefore within the scope of congressional power under clause 3 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution. Such being the case, it has long been the duty of Congress to put a stop to foreign discriminative underwriting, chartering, and loading our vessels in our ports. * * * Any system of encouragement or protection to shipping that does not embrace this subject will surely fail.

British mercantile discrimination: As "Alps on Alps arise," so do discriminations against American vessels. We have to contend with other classes than the shipowners and underwriters of Great Britain. The merchants in their chambers of commerce have their rules and regulations, their tariffs and prohibitions, for the protection of British interests. For a long time it has been privately circulated in American ports that the grain buyers of Liverpool will not pay so much for wheat brought to market in American as in British ships, hence the greater part of American carriage to Europe has gone to continental ports. Matters like this seldom get into print—not even into market reports. It seems we are now so nearly conquered nautically and so nearly dead in national spirit that a kick of this kind may be ventured. British merchants are likewise shipowners and underwriters. They back up the Lloyd's, the Wheat Tariff Association, any tactics that will drive out of business American shipping, merchants, and underwriters.

We back up nothing maritime in this country; on the contrary, we hobble it, put obstacles in its way, handicap it, and place those of our citizens engaging in maritime pursuits under a ban, and about the only attention they receive through the press is an unfavorable attention. While the American press is very obviously disinclined to publish matters favorable to American maritime interests, this disinclination is not manifested when opportunity offers to say something ill of American maritime matters and Americans identified with them. If you doubt it, examine the newspaper reports of the extended discussion in Congress of this administration shipping bill during the past few months. Occasionally—I might far more truthfully say rarely—a paragraph is inserted, usually in some out-of-the-way or obscure place, regarding some maritime matter of considerable or unusual importance, if favorable to American interests, but far more often the whole matter is suppressed. "Pitiless publicity" seems as necessary in respect to the handicaps besetting American maritime interests as to other matters, but it would be interesting to learn how it will receive it if the press, and especially the press associations, have decreed that such interests and matters shall only have unfavorable and never favorable publicity. Evidently there is a wide and inviting field for the Federal shipping board, when appointed, in the way of investigation; and it will be a wise board if it will, in some way or another, secure a thoroughly competent and successful press agent and then give free play to his activities. The country evidently is ripe for it. It needs it.

Capt. Bates then inserted in his book a letter from the California Bankers' Magazine to the editor of the London Bankers' Magazine, pointing out the boycott on wheat shipped to Great Britain in American vessels, the boycott being maintained through the unwillingness of British marine underwriters, maintaining their agencies in San Francisco and doing business under California's laws, to insure wheat cargoes in American vessels, so as to force shipments in British vessels.

No merchant—

Wrote the indignant editor of the California Bankers' Magazine—

dare pass his bill of lading and drafts with an American policy or the cargo would be unsalable en route. It is a sine qua non that all cargoes must be insured in your offices. * * * The California insurance offices joined together and put up $150,000 as a gold margin deposit if you would condescend to allow us to insure our own wheat. No! The offer was refused with scorn. Now, suppose, for the sake of argument, that we boycotted you and ordered all these foreign companies out of San Francisco. Our own good companies, the California Insurance and half a dozen others, would make a profit upon our own farmers' wheat that you London men take from us. The boycott is a foul, burglarious weapon that has been imported into America.

Evidently this California editor was aroused.

For several years—

Remarks Capt. Bates—

the Grangers of California shipped their wheat themselves, preferring American ships and insurance companies. British merchants broke this business up.

From this it should not be difficult to discover some of the methods by which American marine insurance companies were years ago forced out of business. As our shipping in foreign trade vanished, so did our marine insurance companies, at least a goodly number of them.

And here we are now handing over to our rivals—really to our chief rival, Great Britain—the last remnant of our maritime possessions, our coastwise carrying and our carrying on the Great Lakes. Senators on the other side have called attention to the laws that have recently been passed by the different great maritime powers forbidding the sale of their merchant ships to aliens. These are war measures largely, but, in addition to that, there are loopholes in those laws; they are not hard and fast. Official authority may be sought, and it may be granted, for the sale of British merchant ships to aliens. We need not doubt that so long as we adhere to the requirement that the foreign ships we acquire must be American owned so long Great Britain will be willing that her merchant ships shall be sold to Americans of the kind that never would be blacklisted, for example, by the British Government. It will not be long—indeed, the time is near at hand evidently—when we shall cease to require that the foreign-built ships that we admit to our coastwise carrying, like that admitted to our foreign carrying, shall be American owned. Already all that is required is that foreign ships shall be chartered or leased, not owned, by Americans to enjoy access to our coastwise carrying and to our carrying on the Great Lakes.

It will be a short and an easy step to the granting of the full freedom of our coastwise carrying to foreign ships wholly under the control of their foreign owners. Then British shipowners will secure—what they have aimed at, at least since 1854, to secure—control of the coastwise carrying of the United States. The strangulation of American maritime interests in our coastwise carrying will hereafter proceed as rapidly as has the strangulation of our foreign carrying. It is a part of Democracy's free-trade program.

Referring to the letter from the California Bankers' Magazine, quoted above, Capt. Bates says in his "American Navigation":

Boycott of the Liverpool Corn Exchange: Besides the evidence above about the London merchants we shall submit a letter from the secretary of the California Insurance Co. in regard to the protective policy of the Liverpool Corn Exchange. This letter corroborates the statement of the other and leaves no doubt of the "taboo" or "boycott" for some time past enforced with more or less rigor against American insurance as a support of American carriage of grain to be sold in British markets. The continental nations, discriminating against American pigs and products, do so under the pretense of health; the British merchants and their agents, discriminating against our vessels, give for an excuse that they are built of wood; but the rapacious claim of insurance monopoly stands undefended and without excuse—a product of "reciprocity."

Hovering on the border of the old, successful, and vigorous American policy of discriminating duties, as so many of our Senators and Representatives are, they rather balk at the word, and the definition of the word, "discrimination." But we see that where it serves British ends Britons do not balk—they discriminate. We adhere to the letter of our obligation to reciprocally treat foreign ships and their cargoes, and we find, when we give it study, that long ago our foreign rivals abandoned "reciprocity," and for many, many years have indulged in "discriminations"—discriminations, whether official or unofficial, that, as we say here, "do the business" or "turn the trick." The name is nothing, but the game is everything. I can not forbear quoting Capt. Bates's concluding comment following the quotation last above made. He said:

It discounts subsidies, subventions, bounties, and all forms of legislative encouragement of shipping but one—the regulation of trade under our Constitution.

In connection with the Democratic platform declaration on American shipping in 1912 I commend that last quotation from Capt. Bates's book to my Democratic friends. Really, they should take it seriously to heart. What is needed is not that we should give away the remnant of the maritime interests we yet have but reach out for those we have lost.

"It is because we have disregarded our rights," says Capt. Bates, "and neglected so long to apply our constitutional power to keep our commerce and our carrying in our own hands that foreign nations have had opportunity to exercise their wits in heading off our people in every direction by means of disreputable contrivances."

Again, I ask my Democratic friends, at least those who sincerely believe in and desire the establishment of a real American merchant marine in foreign trade, to take to heart the observation of this able and virile American writer, as to the method—and the only method—by which to build up our shipping in foreign trade, "the constitutional method" invoked in the 1912 Democratic national platform, but now forgotten and disregarded.

The second letter quoted by Capt. Bates was from William H. C. Fowler, secretary of the California Insurance Co. There are two or three clauses in this letter deserving of reproduction here, as showing, at least to an extent, some of the probable causes for the disappearance of American marine insurance companies. Mr. Fowler says, in part:

You will no doubt be surprised to learn that American insurance companies are tabooed by the Liverpool Corn Exchange from underwriting on our grain exports to Europe, whether by American or foreign vessels. With the view of protecting their own insurance companies, the rule of the exchange is that these cargoes must be insured by standard English companies.

Would it not be interesting and would it not be instructive for Congress to know whether or not that rule still stands? Maybe American marine insurance companies are so few and their range of activities so limited by this time for such a rule no longer to be necessary. But whenever it becomes necessary, we may be sure it will again become operative. The British Government may be neutral, it may observe the letter of its reciprocity obligations to us, but if British merchants do not and they pursue a policy of discrimination that is effective, that helps the British and hurts the American ship and drives out the American ship and the American marine insurance companies along with it, shall we refuse to discriminate; shall we stick to the letter of our reciprocity obligations and see our ships driven off the seas and our marine insurance companies driven out of business?

Need we be surprised that Mr. Fowler states:

There is a marked preference of English companies for English-owned vessels, so much so that some will not write at all on American vessels.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to state that our Government and our shipping have not adopted the English load line which is recommended and demanded by Lloyd's.

Mr. JONES. I think to a great extent that is true.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not to some extent remedy the situation if we adopted the English load line in respect to our vessels?

Mr. JONES. That would correct some of the discriminations, but it would not correct or do away with the policy of these insurance companies who refuse to insure vessels that they do not find in Lloyd's Register and Book of British Shipping. They base the insurance that they will give on these vessels upon the rating that is given to them in Lloyd's. What the Senator suggests, however, would correct some very serious discriminations that really apply against our own shipping and in favor of British shipping.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to this: One serious defect of the bill is in establishing a board to have regulative power over our shipping and then failing to group all the branches of the maritime service that have anything to do under that board. For instance, even with this board in existence we still have the Bureau of Navigation in the Department of Commerce, and we have the Steamship-Inspection Service, a distinct bureau. It seems to me if we want to establish a shipping board all these activities—that of the Bureau of Navigation and that of the Steamboat-Inspection Service—ought to be grouped and put in charge of the board. Does not the Senator think that that would be proper?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. The Bureau of Navigation is practically only a statistical bureau, but it performs most valuable work. It has performed such work while I have had anything to do with it as a member of the Commitee on Commerce. It has come under my observation that it rendered most valuable and efficient service, but that work should be put under the shipping board, so that the shipping board would be in direct touch with it. The Steamship-Inspection Service goes to the shipping qualifications of the vessels, and manifestly that branch of the service ought to be under the control of the shipping board. Does it not strike the Senator as though that is a great defect in the administrative features of this bill?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I am inclined to favor the establishment of the shipping board, but I do think that whatever shipping board is established ought to have transferred to it just as the Senator suggests and as the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] suggested the other day in his very able argument these various bureaus and branches of the Government that deal with American shipping and get them all under one head, all in one body and under one supervision, so as not to duplicate the work. Instead of vesting this board with power to attempt to regulate rates and charges and so on, if you would get these different bureaus in the matter of inspection and all that sort of thing under one supervision, you give them supervision of it and make it their special business to try to improve it and remedy defects in administration and otherwise, then, indeed, this board would be worth something not only to what American shipping we have but in the encouragement of its development.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator believe that placing our shipping engaged in foreign commerce under the restrictive regulations of this bill will be a great handicap and prevent them from competing with British ships that are immune from such regulations?

Mr. JONES. Absolutely.

Mr. NELSON. Will it not be one of the most serious drawbacks of this bill to have our shipping put into a legislative strait-jacket or under the regulative provisions of the bill as compared with the shipping of other countries, which is practically free?

Mr. JONES. It will.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator in this connection to the fact that the so-called maritime division of the English Board of Trade has supervision of the shipping interests of that country, and at the head of it is a cabinet officer. In the English Board of Trade the maritime section has particularly jurisdiction of the shipping, and they have no such administrative or regulatory power as is found in this bill, nor, as a matter of fact, is it found in the maritime legislation of any of the countries of Europe so far as I have been able to ascertain; at least there is no record of it in any of the Government publications that have lately been issued in this country. There is no system by which they attempt to regulate rates or to publish schedules in advance.

I call the attention of the Senator to some of those small neutral countries in northern Europe which, in proportion to population, have a larger amount of shipping than any other countries in the world. Their shipping in that respect is entirely free, and so, I think, is German shipping under their law. I know that the English shipping is.

Mr. JONES. I think the Senator is entirely correct in that. I do not think it can be found anywhere that any country has endeavored to control the fixing of the rates of the ships engaged in the foreign trade, unless possibly it might be ships that are receiving a subsidy for carrying Government mail or something of that sort. Very few of the other countries have even attempted to regulate the rates and charges in the internal commerce of ships, and in the countries that have even done that in Europe, practically the only regulation that they have made in that respect has been with reference to ships carrying mails or doing Government business. France, I believe, has very largely regulated what we might call her inland or coastwise shipping, but not until after she got a regular standardized system of canals connecting practically every part of the country.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that all the inland shipping of Germany, for instance, that goes on her rivers and canals is practically subject to Government control to the extent of having it run in harmony with the railroads, and that is because in Germany the railroads are State owned by the Government, and they compel the water navigation to run in harmony with the railroads in order to support them.

Mr. JONES. That is correct. My recollection is that I have seen it stated, also, that in France they actually prohibit the railroads from charging within 20 per cent of the rates on the canal.

I will say that there is a very interesting statement with reference to rate regulations in those different countries, not only with reference to domestic commerce but also with reference to foreign commerce, in the hearings taken before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce. It is a statement made by Mr. Thompson, the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. It gives some very valuable information, and I think the information is very reliable.

So far as the provisions of the bill with reference to a regulation of rates and charges by our interstate-commerce boats are concerned, I have no special objection to that, except I can see where the tendency of it will be toward monopoly and toward the driving out of business of the small shipowners.

Mr. NELSON. And tramp vessels.

Mr. JONES. And what we call the tramp vessels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. I am glad to have the suggestions of the Senator. What we commonly call the tramp vessel in interstate trade—in other words, the little boat that stops here and there and yonder and takes up a little freight here and there and yonder along adjoining States or waters connecting the different States—is very likely to be driven out of business by this regulation. It will all be transferred to companies sailing along regular lines. Those companies, of course, can be very easily regulated, and I think it would be a wise provision if we put in the bill a limit upon the regulation of rates in domestic commerce to regular ship lines traveling regularly between definite ports.

Perhaps the following two paragraphs, which let in a strong side light on the decline of American marine insurance, will help the people of the United States to realize how effective British methods are in fostering and promoting British maritime interests:

> American companies commenced to lose control of their [insurance] business when foreign capital began to operate in the United States. Competition naturally followed, and, to retain their own, American companies had to meet the cut rates and low quotations which foreign companies offer to get the business on their books.
> Through adverse legislation of all our States against American insurance corporations; the arbitrary attitude of some of their insurance commissioners in the matter of our investments, although the assets of foreign companies are accepted without question, doubt, or examination; and on account of the favorable conditions under which foreign capital can operate in America, it will be but a short time before our companies will have to cease to be marine underwriters.

I had a curiosity to ascertain whether or not the California Insurance Co. still does a marine business; and it may not surprise you to learn that it does not. So far as marine insurance goes, the California Insurance Co. had to quit. It still continues as a fire insurance company.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to another matter in connection with this insurance question. I had some experience some years ago when I was chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I found, on examining our laws—and they are unique in that respect—that if an American vessel is seaworthy and properly manned they are not liable for any negligence, and under no circumstances are they liable for any loss of life or any damage for loss of property, except to the extent of the value of the ship and the freight earned. Of course, if there is a wreck, and it occurs through the negligence of the owners of the ship, that is gone, for there will be nothing to pay the losses except the freight earned.

I tried some years ago when I was chairman, as I have stated, to have the law amended so as to make our vessels liable for negligence in their operation; in other words, that it should not be sufficient that the ship was sufficiently manned and that she was seaworthy to escape liability, but the vessel owners, in operating the vessel, must not be guilty of any negligence. I was met by a delegation that came before our committee and who stated that it was wholly unnecessary; that a man can insure his cargo or his freight or insure his life and protect himself and have the insurance company bear that burden instead of inflicting it upon the ship. In other words, they told us there was no need of such legislation to protect against negligence of the ship operator, because you can get insurance against him, and that it was entailing upon the shippers, the men who travel upon the ship, an extra burden; that they were not only required to get the ordinary insurance that they do in foreign countries, but they were required to insure themselves against the negligence of the master and crew in the operation of that vessel.

That is a handicap and a burden which is thrown upon our people in matters of insurance, and that is one item which goes to make marine insurance higher in this country than in Europe. In order to put our shipping on a par with the shipping, for instance, of England, we ought to amend our maritime laws so that the ship operators, the men who sail and navigate ships, shall be liable for all damages that occur in consequence of their negligence. In that case you make it easier for people to get their cargo insured when the ship is lost.

Mr. JONES. That is a very interesting and a very valuable suggestion.

Mr. CHILTON. Is not the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] a reason why even foreigners have invested in American shipping? Has not the fact that the American owner of a ship has immunity, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, induced even foreigners to invest in American shipping? In other words, it is a benefit to the owner of a ship.

Mr. JONES. I doubt if there is very extensive foreign investment in American shipping. There may be foreign investment in domestic shipping.

Mr. CHILTON. We are talking learnedly about the handicaps that the American shipper has. Now, is not one of the things that is not a handicap but a distinct advantage to him the very thing suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, to wit, that in this country the shipowner is not liable except to the extent of the value of the wreck or the ship, whichever it may be, and the freight, whereas in other countries, say in England, he is liable to the extent of about £15, or $75, per registered ton—I think it is £15 per registered ton—which would be about the value of the ship if it were new.

Mr. JONES. That may be true. Of course I am not worrying about handicaps.

Mr. CHILTON. I think the Senator will find that that is one of the advantages of American shipping, that has been—I will not say soft pedaled—but it has not, at least, been much adverted to in this discussion.

Mr. JONES. When the Senator from West Virginia refers to American shipping, does he mean American shipping in the foreign trade or American shipping in the domestic trade?

Mr. CHILTON. I mean American shipping in the foreign trade.

Mr. JONES. We have not very much foreign capital invested in American ships in the foreign trade.

Mr. CHILTON. That is a question, like many others in regard to this bill, as to which we have not very accurate information. We are having a lot of guessing, but we have not a great deal of information.

Mr. JONES. I think I have looked into the matter very carefully, and I do not think the Senator will find very much foreign capital invested in American ships in the foreign trade.

Mr. CHILTON. I have not seen many accurate figures on that subject, and I have reason to suspect that the facts may be otherwise.

Mr. JONES. But those are not the questions that I am chiefly devoting myself to to-day anyway. At any rate, those would be very good suggestions for the investigation of the board for which we provide in the bill, to look into and to refer to the matter of the transfer of the inspection service, and all that sort of thing. Even if it is not provided in the bill, I would expect that one of the first recommendations that would be made by this board to Congress would be the transfer to its jurisdiction of these various bureaus having to do with the merchant marine.

So, what Mr. Fowler prophesied long ago came true, because American marine insurance companies now underwrite only a small proportion of the maritime risks of the United States.

Through the effective boycott of American marine insurance companies—not by the British Government, to be sure—and discriminations against American ships—again, not by the British Government, but in each case through British agencies, and, most of all, completely as effective in their operations as if they were conducted by the British Government—it becomes easier for us to understand how it is that American enterprise has been insufficient to make head against foreign competition in the carriage of our imports and exports.

Should we denounce our rivals? To what end? It were far better that we should learn—not necessarily to discriminate precisely as our rivals discriminate but to discriminate in that way, in any way that we find is best for ourselves and for our own welfare as a nation and as a people. Why should we longer be deterred?

With the insurance of our ships and their cargoes largely in the hands of our foreign rivals—as is the case to-day—naturally both our commerce and our shipping are at their mercy. Already we have seen how merciful our rivals are, or were, when they were given a free hand, by us, in discriminations against our ships and our marine insurance companies, protected, the while, by State laws more friendly to them than to our own home companies, our own home capital, our own home people. We have also seen that discriminations, to be effective, need not, necessarily, be practiced by foreign governments in order to be just as effective in discouraging our shipping and its related interests as if such discriminations were practiced by the foreign governments themselves. What are we going to do about it? Surely, it suggests a field for up-to-date, thoroughly searching, and completely effective investigation by our Federal Shipping Board, if and when created, or by some equally authoritative governmental agency. Manifestly, such an investigation should by no means be limited to the laws and regulations of foreign Governments—the investigation should search out and find every agency, governmental or private, that practices any methods and employs customs destructive of successful American competition in everything that appertains to the building and operation of ships in foreign carrying, and all of the accessories of such building and operation.

Closely related to this question of marine insurance of hulls and their cargoes—inextricably interwoven with it, as has already been shown—are the rules under which vessels are built, and the classification and rating they receive, based upon their construction. This, too, receives the extended attention of the late Commissioner of Navigation, Capt. William W. Bates, in his invaluable work on "American Navigation," which should be read with the utmost care by every student of our maritime problems. On this phase of the subject, he says much, only a little of which I have time to quote:

> It is supposed by many that subsidies, subventions, and bounties constitute the present foreign systems of ship protection. We shall explain these, but in this chapter shall give special attention to a method strictly English, introduced 68 years ago. Few of our people know about this method, or comprehend its want of principle. The author's business experience drew his attention to it 48 years since.
> A rival's craft: When the British Government induced our own ships to give up a moiety of ship protection, on the ground that it would reciprocate, and virtually promised that "reciprocity" or non-protection, should prevail in direct trade thenceforth, it was assumed, at least in the United States, that fair and honorable competition would be common on both sides. The idea was that the flag should cut no figure in freighting. It was supposed, of course, that preference would rule engagements in many cases, but very few anticipated that this principle could or would be worked by private endeavor into constituting an effectual system of shipping defense—that only the Government of a country could accomplish actual protection. The unexpected happened, however. Being an older and richer country than our own, Great Britain had, or could create, institutions that could take the place of Government. Therefore we have now to describe the action and review the policy of such establishments as the Society of Lloyd's Register Association, and other bodies having power to influence business for the British marine, and to discourage employment for "foreign" ships.
> Nature of insurance power: Of the forces that may be mustered to favor or impede the employment of vessels, underwriting leads the list, with ship inspection, classification or rating, registration of character, and sea insurance. Not only hulls, but cargoes and freights—all things at risk in navigation—are the subjects of influence, control, or interdiction. From the laying of her keel and during the life of a vessel she is subject to an irresponsible rule which she may not profitably defy. When this rule is lodged with and controlled by a foreign nation it may work the utter failure of the best-built marine.

Here we reach the fundamentals essential to the creation, development, and maintenance of a marine of our own. If our foundation is unsound or insecure or subject to the control of our strongest rivals, very naturally our whole position is in peril. The more we build upon such a foundation the greater the danger attending our superstructure. It is, therefore, of the very greatest importance that our foundations be ample, sound, broad, and firm, but, most of all, completely under our own control always. If the rules for the construction of ships are not in our own hands, or if, on the contrary, they are formulated by our rivals, manifestly we are in a dangerous position. Especially is this true when the classification and rating of vessels are predicated upon construction, because classification and rating form the basis of insurance of both the vessels and their cargoes. What obstacles to our success, what handicaps and hurdles we invite, what dangers of destruction we incur, if we lodge in the hands of our rivals the control of the rules under which we build vessels, the classification and rating of them, and the insurance of the vessels and their cargoes. How far may we reasonably expect to go, so circumstanced?

We are proud of the fact that to-day in the United States every shipyard is filled with vessels under construction, in some cases work being pushed night and day, and with orders ahead for still more vessels as quickly as the ways upon which they are built are cleared by launchings. But it is a fact but very little known that almost every vessel building in American shipyards, at least for ocean navigation, is building under the rules of the British institution—privately owned—known as Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, and this is so largely because when the vessels are completed they may be "classed at Lloyd's," in order thus to secure for themselves and for their cargoes all of the marine insurance required, as has been said, it being impossible to secure a sufficiency of insurance in American companies to cover all of the risk.

Experienced American vessel owners discover that if they build according to American rules they are merely piling up trouble for themselves. To avoid such trouble they build their vessels according to Lloyd's rules, and thus receive Lloyd's classification, whereupon they are able to secure insurance for the vessels and for their cargoes in British companies.

If any innovations or departures, even in the line of better construction, more economical and thorough, are attempted here, full drawings of plans and specifications must be sent to London, where they can be examined by the committee of Lloyd's Register. This delays construction, subjecting builders to great cost, and, if the changes in the end are rejected, the expense of the vessel's construction may be enormously increased in bringing her within the conservative lines required by the London committee of Lloyd's Register. The same is true of engines and boilers, in which the least departure from established methods is attempted. The London committee must O. K. The most costly and exasperating delays follow before the decision of the London committee is obtained. This has a tendency to discourage progress in designs of vessels and in the methods of their construction in the United States, to keep this country behind other countries in the latest, most economical, and most efficient designs or types of ships, and it allows our foreign rivals to set the fashions that this country must, willy-nilly, follow in the building of ships.

Recently Democrats have indulged themselves with hopes that the United States will be able to adopt some new design, some radical departure, in the building of ships with which our people can go out on the sea and meet—indeed, overcome—foreign competition. This is an illusion; it is a dream, a mirage. The committee of Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping has the final say. It may reject our new type. It will reject it, out of hand, if it scents the least danger of real American competition; and if the London committee does reject it, the jig is up. There will be no American maritime development worth speaking of so long as Lloyd's Register rules the roost, as now it does.

To be able to build the kind of ships we want, to be able to adopt new designs, to be able to put upon the sea a superior type of American ship, we must first possess, under our own control, marine insurance sufficient to carry every American maritime risk, to carry it wholly in the United States, and wholly free of any need of foreign reinsurance. The sine qua non of an American merchant marine—that is to say, a real American merchant marine—is an abundance of American companies willing to assume, and themselves carry, every American maritime risk.

Probably there is no business in which Americans can engage—no new business, in the United States, at least—that presents more attractive features in the way of safety of investment and assurance of large profits than that of marine insurance. This has recently been demonstrated, and most strikingly demonstrated, by our Government itself. When the European war broke out ocean transportation stood still until the matter was settled of how, and by whom, war insurance could be obtained. Our own American companies felt too timid to take the risks that were necessary. It required a great deal of courage, in the face of unseen and most threatening conditions, for any company—least of all any American company—to indemnify ships and their cargoes against losses due to war. So, we all remember, the Government stepped into the breech, and appropriated a fund of $5,000,000 with which to establish a War-Risk Bureau of its own, and it appropriated $100,000 additional for the expenses incident to the administration of that bureau. This Government War-Risk Bureau, as I understand it, has not undertaken to compete with private companies—quite the contrary. It has been a sort of court of last resort. When war-risk insurance could not otherwise be obtained on American vessels and their cargoes, only then has the War-Risk Bureau, as I understand its operations, come to the relief of American shipowners and shippers of cargoes in American ships. Its record is most creditable. I am glad to give the details of it. From September 2, 1914, to August 3, 1916, I am reliably informed our governmental War-Risk Bureau has issued 1,543 policies, insuring ships and cargoes of a value of $139,113,727, for which the Government received in premiums $2,924,315.20, with a known loss, to date, of only $771,329.57, reduced through salvage by the sum of $58,818.15, reducing the net loss to $712,511.42, which, on its face, would indicate that the Government War-Risk Bureau has earned a profit of over $2,000,000. But it should be said that there are at risk as of August 3, 1916, $11,802,645, and there still may be losses. They are not likely to be serious or greatly to reduce the Government's profit. It is additionally pleasing to be able to state that the expense attending the conduct of the Government War-Risk Insurance Bureau up to July 3, 1916—a period of 22 months—has only been $33.582.47.

Would not you think, in the light of this experience, that the Government would enjoy going it alone and not depending upon Great Britain or any other country for anything needed for the building up of our shipping in foreign or in domestic carrying? Would you think, in the light of this most gratifying operation of our Government War-Risk Insurance Bureau, that the Government would want to start out to destroy our coastwise and Great Lakes' wholly American merchant marine?

Now, the Government has given the country an exhibition of the safe character even of war insurance risks, and the records of American marine insurance business prove that it is not only an extremely safe business but an equally profitable business—not, of course, as profitable as the Government's war-risk insurance business has been, but profitable enough, one would think, to stimulate the formation in this country of enough American marine insurance companies to carry every dollar's worth of American maritime risk, and without reinsuring a dollar's worth of it in any foreign country on earth.

It is not my intention to burden this record with a great mass of statistics, although a study of marine insurance, in detail, is necessary to a comprehensive knowledge of that business. Such details are to be found more completely in the report of the superintendent of insurance of the State of New York than in any other authoritative publication that I know of. And yet that report does not cover all of the marine insurance business conducted in the United States. On the Pacific coast, I am informed, there may be foreign insurance companies doing a marine insurance business not covered by this report. But the total of any such business is comparatively small. The figures I am about to quote cover, approximately, the great bulk of American marine insurance.

Quoting, therefore, from the report of the superintendent of insurance of the State of New York for the year ending with last December, I find that the marine and inland insurance risks written during the year totaled $21,526,601,714, the premiums charged thereon totaling $101,538,966.35. Of this business risks in force at the close of the year totaled $1,722,020,767. This covers the business of 17 New York State joint fire and fire and marine insurance companies, which wrote marine and inland risks totaling $1,123,610,704, the premiums charged upon which were $5,340,607.83, of which risks, amounting to $144,983,318, were still in force at the end of the year; 26 joint-stock fire and fire and marine insurance companies of other States, which wrote risks totaling $5,499,042,415, the premiums on which as charged amounted to $38,641,717.09, of which risks, amounting to $612,461,002, were still in force at the end of the year; 10 foreign fire insurance companies, the branches of which in the United States wrote risks totaling $525,763,118, the premiums charged upon which amounted to $3,717,869.60, of which risks, amounting to $105,640,298, were still in force at the end of the year; 2 New York State marine insurance companies, which wrote risks totaling $2,000,346,005, the premiums charged upon which amounted to $7,460,188.00, of which risks, amounting to $192,826,616, were still in force at the end of the year; 2 marine insurance companies of other States, which wrote risks totaling $2,007,570,542, the premiums charged upon which amounted to $6,829,376.27, with risks, amounting to $136,560,001, still in force at the end of the year; and 27 foreign marine insurance companies whose United States branches wrote risks amounting to $10,420,268,930, the premiums charged on which amounted to $39,549,207.47, with risks, amounting to $529,549,532, still in force at the end of the year. On its face this would indicate that American companies wrote risks totaling $10,580,569,666, the premiums charged on which amounted to $58,271,889.28, and with risks still in force totaling $1,086,830,937 at the end of the year; and that foreign companies did a business in the United States of writing risks totaling $10,946,032,048, the premiums charged against which amounted to $43,267,077.07, and with risks, amounting to $635,189,830, still in force at the end of the year.

My information is that, as a very large part of the marine and inland risks written by American companies was reinsured in foreign companies, the net result to American companies was quite substantially less than would appear upon the face of the figures tabulated. The probability is that few, or none, of the risks written by foreign companies were reinsured in American companies; and this is what justifies the statement that the great bulk of the profits of the marine insurance business that arises in the United States, in connection with vessels and their cargoes, go out of the United States for the enrichment of foreign companies.

The report of the superintendent of insurance for the State of New York, from which I have quoted the figures given, states, as I have said, the premiums charged on the marine and inland risks assumed by these companies, but the premiums seem to be gross sums that, while charged and doubtless paid by the insured, and which amount to slightly more than $100,000,000 by no means wholly accrue to the companies, vast sums being paid in commissions—which commissions, I presume, are a necessary part of the actual expense of conducting the insurance business. One of the tables in the report indicates the "marine and inland premiums written" as distinct from the table from which I have already quoted, showing premiums "charged" on the marine and inland risks assumed, but this table omits any reference whatever to the New York State marine insurance companies, to the marine insurance companies of other States, and the United States branches of foreign marine insurance companies, a little more than one-half of the entire "marine and inland risks" having been covered by the companies not included in the table that shows "marine and inland premiums written" and the succeeding table, which shows "marine and inland losses."

Bearing in mind, therefore, that something less than half of the marine and inland insurance business is covered in the figures immediately following, it may be said that we are able to come measurably near to ascertain the profits and losses of this business, but not wholly so, because of the "risks in force" at the end of the year, which have still to be reckoned with, and the losses incident to them paid, and paid, seemingly, from the net returns to the companies on premiums received.

With these qualifying remarks, the figures show that the "marine and inland premiums written" by the New York State joint-stock fire and fire and marine insurance companies, the joint-stock fire and fire and marine insurance companies of other States, and the branches in the United States of the foreign fire insurance companies amounted to a total of $28,110,554.49, and that the "marine and inland losses" of these same mentioned companies aggregated $13,053,663.52. It is proper here again to observe that if the distinctly marine insurance companies of New York State, of other States, and the American branches of foreign marine insurance companies were included in the figures just quoted, the aggregate amount in each case would probably be something more than double the figures actually given.

Of the "marine and inland premiums written," the New York State joint-stock fire and fire and marine insurance companies received $3,641,378.04, with losses amounting to $1,584,772.40; the joint-stock fire and fire and marine insurance companies of other States received from "marine and inland premiums written" $21,804,038.85, their "marine and inland losses" aggregating $10,357,834.15; and the American branches of the foreign fire insurance companies received from "marine and inland premiums written" $2,665,137.60, the "marine and inland losses" of which branches aggregated $1,111,056.97.

I place these extremely valuable and interesting data before the Congress in the hope that they will lead to further study along the lines I have indicated, and if the press of the country would but bring the facts regarding the marine insurance business of the United States forcefully to the attention of the people, doubtless the investing public, considering the vast sums in the United States seeking profitable and safe investment, would quickly see to it that new American marine insurance companies were organized, and existing fire insurance companies would doubtless arrange to enter into the profitable business to be found in the assumption of American maritime risks. Indeed, I am informed that already a number of the leading fire insurance companies have had their charters so changed as to enable them to undertake marine business, and the belief is that as the safe character of the investment and the large profits accruing from it become better known, still more fire insurance companies will enter into the marine field, to the end, and as quickly as possible, that this country may be able to carry through its own companies all of the maritime risks upon American vessels and their cargoes engaged in any trade.

The accumulated premiums, Mr. President, obtained on account of maritime risks assumed by insurance companies must necessarily find safe and profitable investment during the period of their accumulation, and until they are paid out in losses, or are properly charged up as the earnings of the companies. These vast sums, aggregating many millions of dollars, could very well find safe investment in American shipbuilding and in American shipping companies, as now obtains in foreign countries from premiums earned by foreign companies earning vast profits from marine insurance, so much of which go to them from this country. Thus it is in other countries—and so it should be in this country—that not only do the marine insurance companies indemnify vessel owners and the owners of cargoes in vessels against the losses incident to their businesses, but they afford the basis for safe loans and investment in related maritime enterprises, all of a most healthy and salutary character.

From all the information I can gather, never were the opportunities better nor greater for this kind of American investment than now, and I cherish the hope that in happier days when the maritime business of the United States will be restored to Americans, shipowners and shipbuilders alike, American marine insurance companies will expand with them, to the end that we may acquire in time—I sincerely hope in a short time—a real and a true American merchant marine in this country, consisting of vessels built in the United States wholly owned by American citizens, commanded, officered, and manned by American citizen—the only kind of an American merchant marine that will be helpful as naval auxiliaries, the only kind of an American merchant marine that we may safely depend upon for the expansion and development of our foreign commerce. And my great, my sincere, regret is that my Democratic brethren can not see this matter in its true American light; throw sectional and partisan feelings to the winds and unite, as patriots and as statesmen, in lifting the maritime interests of the United States wholly out of politics and establishing them as strong and enduring institutions of American progress and development.

Mr. President, a very interesting clipping was sent to me this morning. It seems to be copyrighted, and therefore I will not ask that it be put in the RECORD; but it is an article by John L. Balderston, in the Pittsburgh Dispatch of Sunday, August 13 of this year, with reference to what he saw in going through the shipyards of England a short time ago. He makes some statements here which, if true—and I have no doubt that they are true—ought to lead us to reflect and consider what action we should take, not only with reference to American shipping of a commercial character but also with reference to our naval construction.

We have just authorized a large naval program, and I see that it is reported in the press that the Secretary of the Navy is ready with his plans and specifications to let contracts for all these ships immediately upon the enactment of this law. In my judgment, this is a case where haste makes waste; and where there is the more haste there is the less speed. According to the suggestions made here, these ships, when they are constructed, if constructed upon the plans that we no doubt have now, will be out of date by the time they are finished. His idea is that Great Britain is now actually constructing in her naval yards and in her shipyards war vessels that will far surpass in tonnage and in speed and in armament anything that we have planned or that we contemplate under our naval program. If he is correct, then our ships, as naval vessels, are out of date before they are commenced.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. How does the Senator from Washington regard this proposition of buying ships, if they can be bought now, or having ships built, if they can be built now, for the Government at a cost of $100 to $160 per gross ton, as compared with prices in normal times, before the war, or from thirty to forty dollars a gross ton, or an increase of 100 per cent? What does the Senator think of buying those vessels, or having them built, at this increased rate, if it can be accomplished? In what condition would we be at the end of five years with those ships on our hands, and what would we get out of it?

Mr. JONES. Oh, we would get very little.

Mr. NELSON. Would not the most of the $50,000,000 be a dead loss?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I covered that in my speech the other day. The building of these naval ships has nothing especially to do with this bill; but I am just calling attention to this article and the statements made by this gentleman who went through these yards. He was not, however, permitted to give details. This much was allowed to pass by the censor. I am simply calling attention to these as suggestions that might be considered in carrying out the program that Congress is just authorizing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What was the name of the author of the article? Did the Senator give it? I did not hear it.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I did. The author is John L. Balderston. The article was published in the Pittsburgh Dispatch of Sunday, August 13, 1916. The article is entitled, "Wonderful new navy growing on the Clyde."

The suggestion was made the other day, in the consideration of this bill, by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] that at the end of the war the shipping that has been sunk, and all that sort of thing, would cause such a shortage that these abnormal conditions would continue. Of course, that is true to a certain extent; but this gentleman gives some suggestions or ideas here that it is well for us to take into account in connection with that. He says:

> Sandwiched in between cruisers, destroyers, battle cruisers, and submarines I saw many great freighters which will take the places of those sunk by the Germans.

They are under construction. He says, further:

> I understand that in some of the other great shipbuilding centers, which I have not visited, more merchant ships are being built than on the Clyde, which has until very recently been given over almost entirely to naval work. Merchant ships which stood untouched on the slips from the day war began are now being hastily completed. It is recognized by the Admiralty that the shortage of tonnage is so serious that a freight steamer has become valuable as a means toward winning the war, no less than a warship.

To an American, viewing the incredible number of warships building on the Clyde and reflecting, as was inevitable, upon his own Navy, thoughts not altogether agreeable were bound to come. I am in no way qualified or disposed to offer criticism of our methods at home, but I feel most positive that if the British permitted the world to know anything of what they are doing in warship construction, very much more emphasis would be laid upon speed in our new ships. Above all, it is not enough now to lay down ships as fast as those which appear upon the published naval lists of foreign powers. "The ships which England tells the world about are already out of date," said A. H. Pollen, the famous naval expert, in a recent conversation.

That remark came back to me on the Clyde, when I remembered recent discussions in the American newspapers about some of our new battleships, to be the most powerful in the world, and some battle cruisers to be the most powerful of their class, which Congress is just now providing for. When they will be laid down, I don't know. It is perhaps correct to say that these ships are the most powerful concerning which public discussion has taken place anywhere. But I trust the British censor will allow me to say that I have seen British ships building which vastly outclass American ships which as yet are only talked about as the biggest or most powerful or fastest ships of their class. I should be angry if an Englishman said to me: "The British build first and talk afterwards, while you—" but I will not pursue the matter further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. On yesterday the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] asserted that the loss of ships on the part of the allies, constituting the great maritime nations of the world, was so great that there would be a tremendous demand for American ships after the war closed. I was tempted at the time to interrupt the Senator to say that I had no doubt Great Britain was as busy as she possibly could be at the present time in building merchant ships to supply the loss that she had sustained during the war, and that article confirms the thought I had in my mind then. I apprehend that when the war closes Great Britain will have at least as many ships as she had when the war began, and better ships at that.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I think I referred to it in my speech the other day. I saw in the paper just a few days ago the statement by some person who claimed to be talking in an authoritative way that the German yards were working day and night in the building of merchant ships, and that they were building some of 56,000 tons.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NELSON. In support of the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, I beg leave to quote a little item from an article contained in his speech, found on page 12571 of the RECORD. It is a small matter, but still it supports the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire:

It is interesting to note that in spite of the fact that Norway has lost more ships due to war causes than any other neutral nation, she shows the second largest gain, amounting to 139 ships of 306,547 gross tons.

Since the war began about 150 Norwegian ships have been sunk by German submarines; yet in spite of that fact she has increased the total amount of her shipping by 139 ships of 306,000 gross tons.

This appears in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire. I quote it from that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know who is the author of the article from which the Senator from Washington has read, but I assume, from such portions as the Senator has read, that he is a man of some distinction in the shipping world; at least, as an expert or authority on the business. Some of the statements made in the article are certainly extremely interesting, and I was going to suggest to the Senator from Washington that he incorporate the entire article in his remarks.

Mr. JONES. Would the Senator say that I have a right to do it? The article is copyrighted. It closes in this way:

Copyright, 1916, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.

I do not know whether I had better have it printed or not, in view of that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have never known the Public Printer to exclude from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any quotation from any book, whether copyrighted or not. I do not assume that that would hold as against a Government publication.

Mr. JONES. I do not suppose they would object to it. I do not know whether this company would object to its being printed in the RECORD or not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There have been quite a number of quotations here from the works of the President of the United States, "The New Freedom" and "Congressional Government," and so forth; and I never heard any complaint about their being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. We have quoted from them, but we have not quoted them in full.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator has quoted such portions as he thought would strengthen his position.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. But surely the publishing house that has copyrighted that article could not prevent a Senator from reading it in this Chamber.

Mr. JONES. No; I think not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is printed, I apprehend, for the purpose of being read; so I think the Senator could safely place it in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. I will ask permission of the Senate, then—because it is a very interesting article—to put it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be the order.

Mr. JONES. I will say that I do not know the gentlemen, so far as that is concerned.

The article is as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Dispatch of Sunday, Aug. 13, 1916.]

WONDERFUL NEW NAVY GROWING ON THE CLYDE—SOLID WALLS OF BIGGER, FASTER, MORE POWERFUL WARSHIPS THAN HAVE APPEARED ON OCEANS—VARIOUS STAGES OF CONSTRUCTION—TO HAVE GREAT FLEET WHEN WAR IS OVER—TORPEDO AND MINE PROOF VESSEL WILL BE WONDER OF THE WORLD—WILL HAVE FOUR TIMES AS MANY SHIPS AS GERMANY AFTER WAR.

(By John L. Balderston.)

[Special letter to the Dispatch.]

GLASGOW, July 26.

The man who saw the warships that are being built along the River Clyde and wrote an account of what he had seen would astound the world. I have just seen the shipbuilding yards of the Clyde, all of them, and my brain is still reeling under the impressions produced by the most stupendous scene of naval activity in the history of the world—the phrase is that of a great builder who stood beside me on a little tug that chugged along mile after mile between what seemed almost a solid wall of hulls towering above us on either side.

But no man may visit the Clyde and describe what he has seen. My trip was arranged by the Admiralty, and what is written here consists merely of an attempt to convey to the reader some idea of what the men and women workers of England are accomplishing without giving away any one of some hundreds of secrets—such big secrets that they fairly shout themselves at the least expert observer who passes them. For the reporter who writes a story about the Clyde, however he may bore his readers in America, may be absolutely certain that he will have at least one most attentive reader in the admiralty buildings in Berlin.

The Clyde in peace time is not a haven of rest. Beside the narrow stream, 20 miles from the sea, and 50 years ago only 3 feet deep, the building of ships in the great yards of Beardmore, John Brown Co., Harlan & Wolf, and a score of smaller firms, goes on continuously. Some warships are always under construction, but normally the bulk of the Clydebank shipbuilding goes to swell the great British mercantile marine, nearly half of which was built here.

To-day, as has been true since the beginning of the war, the navy comes first on the Clyde. Until recently practically no work was done here excepting for the navy. If the reader who has seen the Clyde imagines, however, that he can picture what is going on here by thinking of warships on the stocks instead of freighters and liners, he will underestimate the present rate of construction by several hundred per cent. For it is not only the stocks in use in peace time that to-day hold their growing burdens of steel. Ships are being built all along the banks on temporary stocks, so closely crowded together that it might almost be said that in many parts of the river their number is limited only by the amount of water front, since each ship must be built in a position to launch; and when a ship does take the water it is the custom on the Clyde to-day to commence her successor—not next month or next week, but to-day or to-night. An empty slip on the Clyde was something I did not see.

"We figure that the shipbuilding production of the Clyde to-day is slightly greater than the maximum possible turnout of all the yards of the German Empire," I was told by a member of the John Brown firm. "And in saying that," he added, "I am making a liberal allowance for war-time acceleration over the normal output in Germany."

THE NEW BRITISH NAVY.

Keeping this statement in mind, some conception of the size of the new British Navy which is being silently created may be formed when it is remembered that the Clyde, though the largest manufactory of ships in Great Britain, is by no means the only one. On the River Tyne, on the Humber, and the Mersey, and at Belfast, and in the Tees, Hartlepool, and Wear districts ships are feverishly building, as well as in four great Government dockyards. In 1914 the Clyde produced only one-quarter of the total tonnage built in the country. It may be inferred, therefore, that the British are turning out at least four times as many ships as the Germans possibly can make, and there are good reasons why the proportion is probably very much greater than that.

Our trip down the river was interrupted at several points, and, climbing ashore from a tugboat, I was shown at close range some of the most interesting types of ships, types that were unknown before the war. For instance, a great ship of design most peculiar, torpedo proof and mine proof; she can be struck by torpedoes and mines, but when they go off they can not hurt her. She—but another word about her and the censor would be on my head.

Breathless with admiration, I walked round and round a ship which is so fast that she can sail rings around anything of her approximate class in the German Navy or in any other—so powerful she can blow out of the water the mightiest battleship in the service of Britain's enemy. Eighteen months ago that ship was not even designed; at least, not designed in anything like the ship she appears to-day. When she will be in service I do not know, but she looks about ready for business. I may be permitted to quote the remark of one of the builders of this powerful leviathan: "She will be with the fleet," he said, "less than 17 months after the first plates were laid."

There are other ships building on the Clyde faster than the fastest battle cruiser, mightier than the strongest German superdreadnought. There are ships which I saw which are faster and stronger than the one just mentioned. The most secret details concerning these ships, such as their actual maximum speed, are unknown in the highest naval circles, excepting in that particular most tiny circle to which such things pertain in the ordinary course of business.

The Briton has a reputation for conservatism, but when he takes to the water he forgets this and becomes the most daring of innovators; to illustrate which fact, I may mention a great pile of rusting junk in a certain shipyard. "What on earth's that?" I asked. "Oh," replied my guide, "those were the engines of the ———. We got 'em inside her, then they made some improvements in the design to make them a bit better, so we yanked these out and put in new ones." All this, remember, is a great ship, that must be built, and be built in 17 months.

The greatest of all these ships is being constructed, in great part, by women. I went into the workshops adjoining the ships where she is building, and found the weaker sex perhaps in a majority among the workers. The heavy work, of course, is all left to the men, but in great sheds entirely occupied by women and girls all the delicate work of adjustment that does not require muscles so much as eye was being done. And well done, the shipbuilders say. No one could doubt that Britain has thrown herself heart and soul into this war who stood in that clattering plant, great cranes traveling overhead, enormous hammers descending, forges blazing, and watched these hundreds of women doing the jobs of men who had been called away to fight from this most important of all industries. "If we can put the ladies to building superdreadnoughts, they can do most anything, and we need never lack for men to fight the Boches," remarked a naval officer beside me, and I assented, wondering whether the women whose sharp-eyed work I was watching will be willing to go back to the ribbon counter, the restaurant, the home with its brooms and dish pans when the men come back.

CRUISERS OF MANY KINDS.

Many cruisers of many kinds are building on the Clyde. Patrol boats of exceeding speed, whose mission is to make life unhealthy for the German submarines, are turned out in batches. And wherever there appears no room for a big ship, slips have been erected upon which half a dozen destroyers or submarines are being built. I counted the number of each of these types which I saw during the trip down the river. I am not sorry that the censor does not permit me to print that number, for it would arouse incredulity. I would not believe it myself if I had not made the count. And the submarines and destroyers which are thus being turned out in batches, like standardized cheap motor cars, are very different from those which were known before the war and appear in the naval lists. They are very much bigger, and more powerful, and, above all, faster.

Speed is the dominant note upon the Clyde. Every ship to be seen, of whatever class, is faster than builders of two years ago thought possible. To attempt any further description of the wonders seen on that trip down the river would be futile; I was warned before coming here that I would be allowed to describe precisely nothing at all.

At luncheon on Clydebank, sitting a few yards from a slip where one of the largest Atlantic liners was launched a few years ago, now occupied by a warship bigger than the liner and superior to anything afloat, I put two questions to my hosts, What does Britain want with a navy of such size? and Where does she get the men to man it?

The first question is not so foolish as it sounds. Figures which had just been frankly discussed, and which I can not give, showed conclusively that the feverish shipbuilding of the present, at least with reference to ships newly laid down, can have no reference to danger from Germany in the present war.

At the beginning of the war, the proportion of effective battle strength between Britain and Germany was as two to one, but that proportion is now increasing at a perfectly ridiculous rate. If the war lasts another 18 months, it may be more like four to one, giving the German shipbuilders the benefit of every possible doubt. It is natural therefore to wonder why the strain is being kept up in these islands, for ships are expensive.

Several naval officers of high rank answered my question. They substantially agreed, and I will gather the different points made into one statement. What does Britain want with a navy of such size? It is perfectly true that the margin of absolute safety as against Germany has probably been reached, and if not certainly will be reached long before the ships now being laid down come out. But it is the intention of the Admiralty, at the end of the war, to present before the astounded German people a fleet of such size and power that all thought of ever rivaling Britain upon the seas will vanish from the mind of Germany. Then, and then only, will it be possible to relax the building pressure. Meanwhile, the navy is unhampered by Parliament, since its building activities are wholly secret and it gets all the money it asks for without having to account for a shilling, so the political drag on building programs with which Americans and all democratic peoples, including the British, are so familiar, for the moment does not exist.

AN AFTER-WAR NAVY.

It is intended, however, to produce to the world when peace comes not only an overwhelmingly big navy but the most efficient, with the best guns, the fastest ships, as a proof of the superiority of British design and naval science over the German, which shall convince even the Germans themselves that further rivalry is hopeless.

My second question, as to the possibility of manning the vast numbers of ships which are pouring out of the slips, brought a tribute to the mercantile marine. The number of men now in the navy, I was told, is rather more than twice the number serving in peace time, and most of the new officers are men who served on merchant ships, were members of the naval reserve, and learned enough in their short terms of duty with the fleet in past years to be whipped into shape as capable members of the royal navy in very quick time. As new ships are put into commission, old ones are constantly being shelved, and the crews of the older ships put on board the new ones. The story of how the crews of British submarines are trained was told, but for several reasons I may not repeat it. The difficulty of manning the underwater boats has been solved by a system of training most ingenious, which does not take as long as formerly, and which it is hoped the Germans have not yet fully understood and imitated.

The Clyde is known throughout Britain as the center of labor agitations in normal times, and the introduction of women and unskilled labor into exclusive unions of shipbuilders, jealous of rights and privileges they had won by bitter struggles, has naturally made trouble. Agitators have been deported and newspapers which in the opinion of the Government were preaching disloyalty have been suppressed. The temper of the men, on the whole, is surprisingly good, however. This statement comes from members of the shipbuilding firms, a source not likely to be prejudiced in favor of the workmen. On the day of my visit work was going on as usual, yet the day was a traditional local holiday. There are no holidays on the Clyde during the war and work goes on, day and night, week days and Sundays.

In view of the terrific and continuous labor on the hundreds of ships under construction, I tried to get some idea of the hours the men and women workers are kept on duty. The women regularly get one day off a week, and work as a rule not more than eight hours, and never more than 11, I was told. It has not been found possible to give all the men a day off a week, and stories are told of indispensable workmen whose absence would tie up some whole department working straight through from the beginning of the war, 12 or more hours a day, with only a few days off in 24 months. The working hours are unquestionably much harder than American workmen would put up with, except in such a crisis as this, but the men are successfully appealed to on patriotic grounds. They know that their lot is easy compared to their friends in the trenches, and they know that Britain must have ships.

TO REPLACE LOSS AT JUTLAND.

"It was most touching to see the effect of the battle of Jutland on the curve upon the chart in my office which shows working efficiency," said a manager of one enormous plant which would swallow up the Brooklyn Navy Yard. "There are always a certain number of men who get drunk, or who fail to show up for work, and naturally we have to be pretty lenient with these men, if they are skilled workmen. We can not afford to discharge them. The charts always show, then, a certain falling off from the highest possible level of output.

"But one morning the men read of a fight in which we had lost 17 ships, that struck them hard. I saw the result next week when the curve showing number of hours of time lost through avoidable absence was plotted on the chart. It jumped almost to the perfection line, and a deputation of the men came to the office and said they wanted us to know that the few fellows who didn't show up the morning after the battle news were too drunk to understand that England had lost ships which must be replaced. When they sobered up and took in the news they came back, too. Of course, the effect of such news wears off; it does not last, unfortunately, until the new ships are in commission; but such an incident shows the men's hearts are right. We shall treasure that chart."

It would be misleading, in a story about the Clyde, to give the impression that only warships are under construction. The submarine campaign last year, and especially the more virulent U-boat war this spring, coupled with the highly satisfactory state of the naval building program, resulted in a resumption of the building of merchant shipping on a considerable scale, though not one approaching the normal peace output. Sandwiched in between cruisers, destroyers, battle cruisers, and submarines, I saw many great freighters which will take the places of those sunk by the Germans.

Naval designers have been busy even in this field. It was quite noticeable that many of the ships being built which after the war will travel as ordinary merchantmen had features about them which will make them extremely serviceable to the navy during war time. Special devices for mine sweeping and mine laying and other devices still more closely connected with warfare were to be seen, and I was told that the Admiralty is giving preference in merchant construction to ships which can be used as auxiliaries when needed.

NO WORK FOR PRIVATE SHIPPERS.

All the ships now building on the Clyde, even the most harmless-looking tramps, can only be built by permission of the Admiralty, and the same rule holds in every British shipyard. As a result, no work at all is being done, or has been done during the war, for neutral shipping firms. All energy is concentrated on British need and the needs of the allies. I understand that in some of the other great shipbuilding centers, which I have not visited, more merchant ships are being built than on the Clyde, which has until very recently been given over almost entirely to naval work. Merchant ships which stood untouched on the slips from the day war began are now being hastily completed. It is recognized by the Admiralty that the shortage of tonnage is so serious that a freight steamer has become valuable as a means toward winning the war, no less than a warship.

To an American, viewing the incredible number of warships building on the Clyde and reflecting, as was inevitable upon his own navy, thoughts not altogether agreeable were bound to come. I am in no way qualified or disposed to offer criticism of our methods at home, but I feel most positive that if the British permitted the world to know anything of what they are doing in warship construction, very much more emphasis would be laid upon speed in our new ships. Above all, it is not enough now to lay down ships as fast as those which appear upon the published naval lists of foreign powers. "The ships which England tells the world about are already out of date," said A. H. Pollen, the famous naval expert, in a recent conversation.

That remark came back to me on the Clyde, when I remembered recent discussions in the American newspapers about some of our new battleships, to be the most powerful in the world, and some battle cruisers, to be the most powerful of their class, which Congress is just now providing for. When they will be laid down, I don't know. It is perhaps correct to say that these ships are the most powerful concerning which public discussion has taken place anywhere. But I trust the British censor will allow me to say that I have seen British ships building which vastly outclass American ships which as yet are only talked about as the biggest or most powerful or fastest ships of their class. I should be angry if an Englishman said to me, "The British build first and talk afterwards, while you"—but I will not pursue the matter further.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator that he will not question but that at this time Great Britain has resorted to restricting imports because she has not carriers enough to take the freight that would move if there were adequate transportation facilities. She prefers to devote what tonnage she has to carrying foodstuffs rather than certain other articles of commerce that would go if there were ships to carry them. Now, of course I do not know—we may guess about how busy the yards are—but I apprehend it will be found upon examination that those yards on the Clyde and elsewhere are very much more busy with war orders than they are with the building of merchant ships, and the war orders have precedence, and I very much question if there are many merchant ships being constructed.

Mr. JONES. There is no question but that war orders are given preference so far as that is concerned, and there is not any question but that Great Britain at any rate is prepared for the commercial war that she knows is bound to come when this war closes. I have not any doubt either that Germany, in her extremity, is doing everything in her power consistent with carrying on the war as effectively as possible to also prepare to meet the commercial war that is coming.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is also a fact which can not be denied that when the war closes, and almost every intelligent person believes it will close before any ships can be built under this law, the ships Great Britain and Germany and France have commandeered and taken out of the ordinary service to engage in transporting troops and otherwise will be released and that we shall have a tremendous influx of ships at that time from all those great countries.

Mr. JONES. That is true. As soon as the end of the war is seen those shipyards will bend all their energies toward the completion of merchant ships on the ways and the construction of new ones, and with the wonderful efficiency they will have developed as soon as the war ends they will begin to turn out those ships very rapidly.

There is one other very interesting proposition in this article that I simply want to call attention to. The writer states that practically all the labor, or a large part of the labor, in the shipbuilding plants where they are building war vessels are women. Those women will be trained in that particular kind of work and they are not very likely to quit it, even when the war closes, at least not for a time, under the impulse of the necessity to get merchant ships to carry on the commercial war that will be on.

Mr. President, I have here the Marine News, a very important marine paper published in New York, one of the principal marine papers of the United States. It has a very illuminating article, which is not very long, in the August (1916) number on the importance of marine insurance. I ask that I may insert that in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order may be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IMPORTANCE OF MARINE INSURANCE.

Few people realize that marine insurance is the primary foundation of marine business. If a vessel is uninsurable, so is her cargo, and only under the most unusual circumstances can such a vessel secure a cargo. This is more true in the United States than in other countries. Writers of insurance at Lloyd's will insure almost anything, provided the premiums are high enough. With us vessels must be sound and seaworthy to command insurance for themselves or their cargoes.

The factors determining insurance of vessels and their cargoes are: Character of construction, classification and rating, age, condition of vessels, and other particular. Vessels whose construction conforms to the rules of organization particularizing in classification and rating command preference according to the popularity of such organizations. British shipping is so predominant throughout the world that naturally British ships, especially when classed in Lloyd's Register of Shipping (as is almost invariably the case), are preferred in foreign ports. Lloyd's Register is consulted, and upon the classification and rating therein recorded insurance of vessels and cargoes is based.

We have our own American Bureau of Shipping, under whose rules vessels are built, and which bureau classifies and rates the vessels so built. American marine insurance companies are by no means as loyal to our American bureau in accepting its classification and rating as a basis of insurance as they should be, everything considered. Much is desired in this respect, notwithstanding the better conditions that recently have obtained.

As a rule, especially in large ships of great cost, it is impossible to secure all of the insurance in the United States that is required, either for vessels or cargoes. This compels recourse to foreign (more often British) insurance companies, and if American vessels are not built according to the rules of a British organization difficulty is experienced in securing British insurance, at least as favorable insurance as competing British vessels obtain for themselves and their cargoes. Hence our lack of a sufficiently strong aggregation of American marine insurance companies to cover all American marine risks, both on cargoes and hulls, acts as a serious handicap to American vessel owners, a condition that adds to the strength of our chief rival—Great Britain. What we are unable to do British companies are abundantly able and ready to do, and, naturally, they "skim the cream of the business," and it is extremely rich cream at that.

This naturally tends to discourage American investment in American ships. If we had 25 great American marine insurance companies in this country with resources comparable to those of the well-seasoned and thoroughly mature Atlantic Mutual, not only would all of our maritime risks be covered by American underwriters, but such reinsurance as was done would be largely done in home, instead of in foreign, companies. But, more important still, such an aggregation of American marine insurance companies would give confidence in and impetus to far larger investments of American capital in American shipping. Beyond successful contradiction it may be stated as axiomatic that enormous impetus and tremendous sustaining power would be given to the development of an American merchant marine if we had double—better treble—the number of American companies engaged in marine insurance that we have to-day.

Considering how profitable marine insurance is, it would be strange that American enterprise has been so backward in furnishing enough American companies to do all of our marine underwriting, were it not explained by the fact that American shipping has all but vanished from the high seas. It would have been as impracticable as it would have been incongruous for American marine insurance companies to have flourished while American shipping disappeared. When we had a great American merchant marine in the gala days of our clippers we had numerous American marine insurance companies. They became powerful through their large profits—they reflected, in fact, the profitable condition of our incomparable shipping. In those days—during the first 60 years of the last century—there were enough American companies fully to cover all of the maritime risks in this country, and without resort to reinsuring abroad, which is such a common practice to-day among American marine insurance companies.

More latterly, and contemporaneously with the impetus recently given to American deep-sea shipping, more insurance of American hulls and cargoes is done by American companies than for many years—probably for half a century. Quite a number of the more progressive and enterprising American fire insurance companies—companies whose assets exceed a hundred million dollars—have had their charters changed so as to enable them to engage in marine underwriting. As the success of one is demonstrated through the large profits accruing from marine business, it has given confidence to others to reach out for a share of it. Perhaps in the course of time the growth of this practice might make the United States self-dependent as to its marine insurance. But from every point of view the establishment of a goodly number of substantial new American marine insurance companies would accomplish infinitely more, and in a far shorter period of time, especially, we repeat, in giving confidence to American investment in American ships. We do not say that this alone would result in an American merchant marine equal to the requirements of our foreign commerce, but, unquestionably, it would give real, substantial impetus to the creation and to the maintenance of such an American marine.

It is not that the United States is lacking in necessary capital. On the contrary, we have it in the greatest abundance. Were investors familiar with the profits arising from this business, at once it would be one of our most attractive forms of investment. Indeed, few forms of safe investments are more attractive. The premiums and reserves that accumulate aggregate vast sums of ready cash, which command ready investment in gilt-edge industries and merchandising, as against the time of their addition to growing surpluses of the companies, their payments in dividends, and in losses. It is a business that needs to be better known to be appreciated for its sterling worth and substantial returns, and every day it is becoming better known and more appreciated, which accounts for its steady expansion, an expansion, however, not nearly so rapid as conditions justify. We have come to rely too much upon foreign—chiefly British—companies. Through their long-established agencies here they have come to be regarded almost as parts of ourselves, an illusion fostered by our long dependence upon them and the lack of more purely American companies. The regrettable part of this condition is that such a large percentage of the profits accruing from marine underwriting goes abroad that might far better remain at home assisting in the development of our rich and varied resources.

Mr. JONES. Although I am not going to discuss the discriminating-duty proposition, I have an article here on that subject which I ask may be included in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE DISCRIMINATING-DUTY POLICY FOR BUILDING UP AMERICAN SHIPPING IN FOREIGN TRADE—THE EARLY AMERICAN SUCCESSFUL SHIPPING POLICY UNDER WHICH FOR 72 YEARS AMERICAN SHIPS CARRIED AN AVERAGE OF 80 PER CENT OF AMERICAN IMPORTS AND EXPORTS—A NONPARTISAN PATRIOTIC POLICY ADVOCATED BY EMINENT STATESMEN OF ALL PARTIES.

[NOTE.—When Representative UNDERWOOD presented his tariff bill to Congress it contained a discriminating-duty clause (paragraph J, subsection 7, section 4) by which Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped a start could be made in building up American shipping in foreign trade. Foreign Governments protested against this section, alleging that it would violate existing treaties, but Mr. UNDERWOOD denied that the section would violate any treaties and refused, and the House sustained him in his refusal, to drop the section. Foreign influences were again exerted through our State Department, and doubtless in every other possible way, as soon as the bill reached the Senate, to have the Underwood discriminating-duty section dropped. This time they succeeded. The press has quoted Mr. UNDERWOOD as stating that he would, when the bill went to conference, refuse to concur in the omission of his discriminating-duty section. If he adheres to this determination and the House sustains him, there may ensue a deadlock, unless, indeed, the suggestion contained on pages 69 and 70 of this pamphlet should point the way to an honorable compromise, alike satisfactory to Mr. UNDERWOOD, the House, the Senate, and the President, a compromise affording no basis for the charge that the section would violate any treaty or be an act of bad faith and yet enable the Democrats to carry out their praiseworthy and patriotic plan of building up American shipping in foreign trade.]

With American vessels carrying less than 10 per cent of our imports and exports, and history recording that American ships for many years carried more than 90 per cent of them, we confront the great problem of reviving American shipping in foreign trade.

With American tonnage in foreign trade substantially less than it was in 1810, and with the value of our imports and exports more than twenty-eight times greater to-day than in 1810 the pressing problem of American shipping rehabilitation is emphasized.

The wisest men of history who are recorded as having given attention to this matter have been unanimously quoted as asserting that it is essential to the defense of any nation having a considerable seacoast to possess a home-built merchant marine, manned so far as possible by native officers and seamen, measurably equal to the requirements of its foreign carrying; and, as "trade follows the flag," we have seen that the nation possessing the largest marine also possesses the largest foreign trade.

To-day the foreign carrying of the entire world, through agreements, pools, conferences, and rings, bindingly made and rigidly adhered to, is completely controlled by combinations of foreign vessel owners who fix rates and apportion the carrying. It is idle to assert, in the face of this ocean-wide monopoly of carrying, that the trade of the seas is open and free to the ships of all the world.

("The right of the American ship to preference in American commerce is so just, so essential to national welfare, that its rights must be redeemed and secured, even if it tasks the national power." Extract from statement by Capt. W. W. Bates (1904) before the Merchant Marine Commission.)

WHY OUR OCEAN-GOING SHIPPING HAS VANISHED.

There are many reasons why American shipping has all but vanished from foreign trade, some of which are: First, the lack of protection for American shipping in that trade; second, the high protection, through subsidies and bounties, admiralty subventions and naval-reserve retainers (approximating $50,000,000 a year in value) as well as discriminations in rail rates, in favor of foreign shipping; third, the higher cost, due to the higher wages paid to labor in American shipyards, of building ships in the United States, as compared with the cost and wages in foreign shipyards; fourth, the higher cost of operating ships under the American flag, due to the higher pay of American officers and seamen, and the higher quality, resulting in the higher cost, of food on American vessels, as compared with the pay and food on foreign vessels. It should be said that, as everything entering into the construction, repair, outfitting, and equipment of vessels built in the United States, either for foreign or domestic trade, is admitted duty free, the cost of materials no longer constitutes an obstacle to the building of ships in the United States. The rigidity and severity of our inspection laws, as compared with those of other countries, the equipment and manning of our ships, also impose higher cost of operation upon American owners.

BUILDERS AND OWNERS HELPLESS UNDER CONDITIONS THEY CAN NOT REMEDY.

These are conditions for which neither builders nor owners of American vessels are in any way responsible, conditions which they are utterly powerless to change, but which so seriously handicap them in their competition with foreign vessels in foreign carrying as to render profit quite impossible.

HOW THE FOUNDERS OF THE REPUBLIC COPED WITH SIMILAR CONDITIONS.

A similar condition confronted American shipping 125 years ago; foreign ships, then as now chiefly British, absorbed the larger part of our foreign carrying. This was remedied through the enactment by the first and subsequent Congresses of laws discriminating in favor of American vessels. The result of the enactment of these laws was that during the period (over 60 years) that they were in full or partial force, and for 10 years thereafter, American ships carried an average of 80 per cent of American imports and exports. That average was maintained from 1789 until 1861. Since then American ships have carried an average of 19 per cent of our foreign commerce, and they now carry 9 per cent.

DISCRIMINATING DUTY LAWS HAVE NEVER BEEN REPEALED.

These old laws have never been repealed; they are still retained upon our statutes, but in a state of suspension. As their suspension was the ruin of American deep-sea shipping, efforts have been made during the past 20 years to have the laws restored to their old vigor and effect.

WHY THIS PAMPHLET IS ISSUED.

This pamphlet is issued for the purpose of presenting to the people the arguments used by those in Congress in behalf of the readoption of this old policy that was so long and so successfully in force, together with public statements made by others, who have, at different times and in different manners, expressed themselves in favor of the old American policy of discriminating import and tonnage dues.

A DISCRIMINATING DUTY STUDY.

Soon after the Civil War the subject of our shipping in foreign trade was taken up by Congress. One of the first moves toward a readoption of the old policy of discriminating duties resulted from the report by Joseph Nimmo, jr., Chief of the Tonnage Division of the Treasury Department. This report (see Ex. Doc. No. 76, 41st Cong., 3d sess.) set forth the practical workings of "maritime reciprocity" which superseded our discriminatory or preferential laws, and showed most clearly that the United States had suffered seriously as a consequence, and as a consequence of the subsidy laws put into force and so steadily maintained by Great Britain in support of her steam shipping. But nothing came from this discussion, and for 20 years or more thereafter our people and Congress eagerly followed the will-o'-the-wisp of subsidies and bounties, thinking through the adoption of the British policy to restore to American ships a fair share of American foreign carrying. Then followed the Frye ocean mail act of 1891, the provisions of which, as the measure passed the Senate, were reduced one-third in the House. This emasculated and feeble enactment has given us a few lines of steamships, but has been ineffective in arresting the decline of American shipping in foreign trade. Our tonnage in foreign trade in 1891 was 988,719, and in 1912 it was 923,225 tons.

SENATOR FRYE'S ADVOCACY OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

So disheartened and so disappointed was Senator Frye with the result of his efforts in behalf of subsidies and bounties that when the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill was before the Senate in 1894 he formally moved amendments to the vitiated but still existing discriminating duty clauses of that bill that, if adopted, would by this time have gone a long way toward giving adequate protection and proper encouragement to American shipping in foreign trade.

The greater part of Senator Frye's speech in support of his discriminating duty amendments made in the Senate on June 20, 1894, will be found below. Especial attention is invited to his clear-cut and incisive discussion of the shipping question, his bold proclamation that he had always believed this was the wise policy for ths country to adopt, and the eminence of other Senators from different parts of the country who interpolated remarks more or less in favor of the amendments Senator Frye advocated:

SPEECH OF SENATOR WILLIAM P. FRYE, OF MAINE, JUNE 21, 1894.

[See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 7770 to 7774.]

Mr. FRYE (of Maine). I desire to offer amendments to sections 14, 15, and 16. As the amendments have but one purpose I shall offer them as one amendment after the three sections have been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That a discriminating duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by law, shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States; but this discriminating duty shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States, entitled by treaty or any act of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States on payment of the same duties as shall then be paid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels of the United States.

"SEC. 15. That no goods, wares, or merchandise, unless in cases provided for by treaty, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in vessels of the United States, or in such foreign vessels as truly and wholly belong to the citizens or subjects of that country of which the goods are the growth, production, or manufacture, or from which such goods, wares, or merchandise can only be, or most usually are, first shipped for transportation. All goods, wares, or merchandise imported contrary to this section, and the vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, or merchandise, ship or vessel, and cargo shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner and under the same regulations, restrictions, and provisions as have been heretofore established for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of forfeitures to the United States by the several revenue laws.

"SEC. 16. That the preceding section shall not apply to vessels or goods, wares, or merchandise imported in vessels of a foreign nation which does not maintain a similar regulation against vessels of the United States."

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I offer the amendments which I send to the desk as one amendment, because together they effect one purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

HOW TO REVIVE DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 14 by adding thereto the following:

"Until after January 1, 1896, and notice of this provision shall be given all nations before the 31st day of December next."

To amend section 15 by inserting after the word "treaty," in line 2, the words:

"Hereafter made and ratified."

To amend section 16 by adding thereto the words:

Until after January 1, 1896, and notice of this provision shall be given all nations before the 31st day of December, 1894.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, section 14 of the pending bill provides for a discriminating duty of 10 per cent on certain goods which are brought in on American bottoms. It has been a provision of the law for a great many years, but is to-day of no earthly account, because we have given away every advantage we ought to derive from it by reciprocal legislation and by treaties. Undoubtedly, I suppose, the Secretary of the Treasury to-day would say that he did not know of an instance in the last five years when such provisions as those contained in this section 14 had been applicable, and there had been a discriminating duty allowed.

EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS.

The pending amendments, if agreed to, will have this effect: To give notice to all the nations of the earth of a discriminating duty of 10 per cent in favor of all goods brought into the country in American vessels; and that notice will abrogate all treaties hitherto made, which to-day stand in our way, and repeal all reciprocal legislation; and it is for the purpose of making another attempt to revive our marine on the ocean that I offer these amendments.

HOW THE FATHERS DID IT.

The fathers seemed to understand this question perfectly, and in the first tariff act ever passed in the United States, approved July 4, 1789, the following discriminating duties were imposed on teas per pound imported in American vessels:

Teas imported from China or India bore duties as follows: Bohea, 6 cents; Souchong, 10 cents; Hyson, 20 cents; other green teas, 12 cents.

Imported from Europe: Bohea, 8 cents; Souchong, 13 cents; Hyson, 26 cents; other green teas, 16 cents.

If these teas were imported in American bottoms, these duties were imposed, but if they were imported in foreign-owned and foreign-built ships, then the duties were doubled, Bohea tea being 15 cents, Souchong, 22 cents; Hyson, 45 cents; and other green teas, 27 cents, practically doubling the duties on teas imported here in foreign bottoms. On all other goods imported from China or India in foreign ships there was a 12 per cent ad valorem duty.

The same law provided a discount of 10 per cent on all duties on other goods imported in vessels built and owned in the United States as described above.

Thus there was a discrimination of 50 per cent on all teas and a discrimination of 10 per cent on all other goods brought into the United States in American bottoms.

But that did not quite satisfy the fathers. In the act of January 29, 1795, instead of making a discount of 10 per cent of the duties, they provided for an addition of 10 per cent to all duties on goods imported in foreign vessels, except in cases where such additional duty had been before laid.

Again, the act of March 27, 1804, imposing more specific duties on certain articles, provided for 14 per cent additional ad valorem upon importations of such articles in foreign vessels. The same act also provided that a duty of 50 cents per ton, to be denominated "light money," should be levied and collected "on all ships or vessels not of the United States, which, after the aforesaid 30th day of June next, may enter the ports of the United States."

By the act of July 20, 1789, the following duties or taxes were imposed on all vessels:

On vessels built in the United States and belonging to citizens thereof, or built abroad and owned by such citizens on May 29 of that year, 6 cents per ton.

On all vessels thereafter built in the United States belonging to foreigners, 30 cents per ton.

On all other vessels, 50 cents per ton.

United States vessels in the coasting trade to pay tonnage but once a year and foreign vessels employed in our coasting trade to pay 50 cents per ton at each entry; which was an enormous duty.

CAUSE DESPERATE—EFFECT MAGICAL.

What was the trouble which made the fathers provide all these discriminating duties for American ships? It was that in 1789, when the first law was passed, we had but 124,000 tons of shipping engaged in the foreign carrying trade; we carried only 17 per cent of our imports and 30 per cent of our exports; and the wise men of that day determined that we should carry our own imports and our own exports in American-built vessels. So they passed that law. What was the effect? In 1795 we had 529,500 tons of these ships, and carried 92 per cent of our imports and 88 per cent of our exports. In 1800 we had 667,000 tons. We then carried 91 per cent of our imports and 87 per cent of our exports. In 1810 our tonnage had reached 1,000,000, and we were carrying of our imports 93 per cent and of our exports 90 per cent.

The wise men of that day had done well. They had transferred from Great Britain the carrying trade of the United States, which when they entered upon this crusade was 85 per cent, and given it to us; and we carried 93 per cent of our own, and it was done by these laws discriminating in favor of American vessels and against foreign vessels; it was done by men who believed that they ought to look out for their own household first, who loved their own country more than any other and dared legislate as this love prompted.

HOW WE STAND TO-DAY.

How much tonnage have we to-day in the foreign carrying trade? In 1810 we had 1,000,000 tons and were carrying 93 per cent of our exports and imports. To-day we have 938,000 tons, about 100,000 tons less than we had in 1810; and to-day, instead of carrying 93 per cent, we are carrying but 12 per cent of our own exports and imports and are paying Great Britain $175,000,000 every year to do our own carrying trade for us.

Mr. LODGE (of Massachusetts). If it would not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him, in this connection, if Great Britain has not pursued by indirection the same methods—that is, by the rates on insurance at Lloyd's, and by premiums on iron steamships—of discriminating in favor of her own tonnage down to the present day?

PRESENT EFFECTIVE BRITISH DISCRIMINATION.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the most persistent, continued effort on the part of Great Britain to prevent our vessels getting any of the carrying trade has been pursued always from the very beginning down to now. The Lloyds will rate our vessels second rate when they ought to be rated even above a first-rate British ship to-day, and the Lloyds control the entire marine insurance of the world, at any rate so far as that of Great Britain and the United States are concerned. Their companies are controlling all the marine insurance in our country, and are discriminating against our vessels.

Mr. PERKINS (of California). It has been also shown to-day in debate that England will not permit salt to be carried from England to the East Indies from her own provinces in any other vessels except those of English build and flying the English flag.

Mr. PEFFER (of Kansas). Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator from Maine is unquestionably as well informed upon this subject as any member of this body. I wish he would give the Senate the benefit of his views as to how the United States can recover the lost carrying trade. What ought we to do?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I have just offered an amendment to the pending bill which will beyond any manner of question, if it be adopted and the bill become a law, restore the American merchant marine to the old position it occupied in 1810.

Mr. PEFFER. I am to blame doubtless for not having heard the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. It provides a discriminating duty.

Mr. PEFFER. To what effect?

Mr. FRYE. In favor of all goods imported into the United States in American bottoms.

Mr. PEFFER. Another question, because this is a very important matter, and I hope the Senator will pardon me. Does the Senator believe that that policy would be sufficient to overcome the fact that ships, ship tackle, and shipping outfits are all regarded as property taxable under State laws? Then, further, will it not be necessary in the end for the United States in some way to relieve the shipping trade of State taxation?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, under the Constitution the United States can not relieve ships from State taxation; but I am happy to inform the Senator from Kansas that many of the States do now relieve them from this burden. New York does.

Mr. PEFFER. Does Pennsylvania?

Mr. FRYE. I do not know about Pennsylvania, but New York, of course, is the great important owner of ships. I think Massachusetts relieves them from taxation.

KANSAN EXPLAINS SHIPPING HANDICAP.

Mr. PEFFER. Another point. If the Government of the United States were to relieve American shipmasters and American ships from all other burdens except those which are necessarily thrown upon them by the difference in rates of interest on money prevailing in England and the difference in the rates of wages prevailing between the English seamen and ours, would that be sufficient to overcome the difficulty, or if we were to make ships and give them as a gift to American seamen and let them run them on the seas free of duty, free of all charges, either from the State or National Government, is there not enough of difference in the rate of interest of money in Great Britain and the United States and in wages of labor to run the American ships ashore and out of business?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator has opened up a pretty wide subject. The rate of interest is a small matter, and would not make any great difference. The difference in wages in the running of British and American ships is very important, I admit, and also the cost of living on board a British ship as compared with that on an American ship favors greatly Great Britain, and so of all foreign nations. But the most serious thing we have to contend with is that our ships on almost every line of the carrying trade are compelled to compete with foreign ships which are subsidized by Great Britain, Germany, France, Spain, and Italy. The result is that where it costs us to-day $7 or $8 a ton to carry goods, it does not cost them over $5. They have that advantage of us, and we have no advantages to offset. We are competing openly with them, left absolutely alone and unprotected and unencouraged.

The provision which I offer is one of immense protection. I have no doubt it would revive our carrying trade upon the ocean. For 20 years I have been——

KENTUCKIAN WANTS LIGHT.

Mr. LINDSAY (of Kentucky). I ask the Senator, with his permission, when these preferential laws in favor of American ships were repealed?

Mr. FRYE. We made treaties with Great Britain and with Sweden in 1815. We passed acts of Congress in 1817—in 1828, accepted by Great Britain in 1849—providing for reciprocity, by which all protection to our ships in the foreign trade was gradually removed and the right to again encourage by discriminating duties and tonnage taxes surrendered.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will ask the Senator, with his permission, another question, and that is, if the American shipowners did not maintain the supremacy of the American trade until about 1860?

WE THOUGHT WE WERE STRONG.

Mr. FRYE. Just so long as the trade was carried on in wooden ships the United States could and did hold its own with the world, and that was the reason our wise fathers thought that in 1815, 1826, and 1828 they could give those privileges away, that we could compete with Great Britain even, and build ships for her. We were all right, we thought, just as Great Britain thought when she adopted free trade. She believed that she was in condition to stand it, and whether other nations could or not she did not care.

For 20 years I have been trying to restore this American shipping interest to the place to which it is entitled. We have here as powerful a nation as there is in the world, as rich a nation, and more seaboard than any other. We have as good sailors and shipbuilders and as energetic men as can be found anywhere. There is no earthly reason why our flag should not be seen in every port in the wide world, as it was 50 or 60 years ago.

I am not going into the question as to what has caused our decay, because that would necessitate a speech of two hours in length, and I do not propose to delay this bill by anything of the kind. I simply wish to get a vote on this proposition to discriminate—as section 14 recognizes the principle—against all nations in favor of American ships, and give them notice a year in advance that we intend to do so, and thus restore ourselves to our former condition.

("It seems to me that the only way to revive this industry is for the Government to protect it in some manner either by direct subsidy or by differential duties. The latter system would meet with more general favor from all parts of the United States, because it is more in the form of indirect taxation than direct." Extract from remarks before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904), by H. L. Aldrich, president and treasurer of the publication Marine Engineering, of New York.)

I was remarking, when the Senator from Kentucky interrupted me, that for 20 years I have been making this fight. That we have gained immensely in that time there is no doubt, in some respects. We have relieved our ships from an enormous number of burdens, amounting to millions of dollars every year. We never have been able to go the one step further and do what other nations do, put them on an equality by subsidies or by bounties. The Democratic Party is committed against bounties and subsidies, but by no vote anywhere committed against a discriminating duty. There is no Democratic vote in the whole history of the country where the party is committed against such a duty. Here is section 14, which provides for a discriminating duty, which has had the vote of every Senator on this floor.

Mr. President, I believe and have always believed that the true method of revival is through discriminating duties; that the fathers were right; but I have always been restrained by these treaties. Many of our treaties have done us immense harm. The Nicaragua canal would have been to-day built if it had not been for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and if that spook had not been shaken in our faces here in the Senate; and the American merchant marine would have been where England's is to-day if it had not been for the treaties we have made with those countries and our accepted reciprocal legislation. A treaty is no more sacred than a law, and I am in favor of one more trial and of the Democratic Party voting for discriminating duties, they having entered upon the race this very day in section 14, which they knew meant practically nothing.

Mr. CAFFERY (of Louisiana). I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question. I understood him to say that down to 1860 the United States maintained her supremacy in the carrying trade because she had good ships, and because she could build those ships cheaper than England built theirs. If the conditions were changed, and if the United States could build ships as cheap if not cheaper than the English, could she not regain by that her supremacy on the seas?

WHEN WE BEGAN TO LOSE.

Mr. FRYE. No; she could not. I did not mean to say that we retained supremacy down to 1860. We did not. I did not notice the question which the Senator asked me. We maintained our supremacy for a good many years, but not down to 1860. We began to lose very largely our carrying trade along in 1856, 1857, and 1858, and during those years lost more than at any other time except during the war.

Of course, we lost more then, for reasons any Senator can comprehend. During the war we could do nothing for our marine, and after the war for six or seven years we were powerless, because our currency was so disturbed, Great Britain had commenced building the iron steamships and had invented the triple and compound engines, and all that sort of thing, and away she went out of our sight. We let her stay there. We never have in earnest tried to catch her from that day to this.

Mr. STEWART (of Nevada). Before 1860, by subsidizing her mail ships on the ocean, England drove the American lines off.

Mr. FRYE. Oh, yes; her whole history has been one of subsidy.

Mr. BLACKBURN (of Kentucky). Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did I understand the Senator from Maine to say a moment ago that we lost more heavily in foreign commerce during the four years of war than ever before?

Mr. FRYE. In our carrying trade.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Senator mean to exclude or include the coastwise trade?

Mr. FRYE. Exclude it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should like to have the figures in support of that statement. Whilst it is true that the foreign carrying trade of this country was not increased from 1861 to 1865, it is equally true that it was substantially as heavy in tonnage in 1865 as it was in 1861. It did not shrink; it simply failed to increase.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Kentucky, I think, does not know quite so much about this as I do. Pardon the immodesty of the remark.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am used to that from the Senator from Maine.

SHIPS IDLE FROM FEAR.

Mr. FRYE. We had tonnage, but where was it? It was tied up at the wharves, because British cruisers were crossing the ocean and capturing it wherever they could lay hands on it, and we did not dare go to sea. Our ships were tonnage, but they were not carrying freight. If the Senator from Kentucky will look at the reports, he will find that we lost in the four years of war 38 per cent of the carrying trade, and we lost before the war, in from 1856 to 1860, inclusive, about 15 per cent of the carrying trade. We have been losing from that time down to last year, and last year it improved just a trifle. But the tonnage does not tell the story, as the Senator will see. We were afraid of you. We feared you would capture our ships.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There was no occasion for that.

Mr. FRYE. We were afraid you would take our men, force them into your army, and make them fight us, and so we stayed at home, at our wharves.

TIME TO BEGIN ANEW.

Mr. SQUIRE (of Washington). I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question before he yields the floor. Is it not true that one of the reasons for the failure to develop the American shipping is owing to the fact that the American people have been engaged in expending their energy and money in the great internal development of the country of the United States, by its immense railway systems? I desire to ask the Senator from Maine whether that is not a great reason for the failure to undertake exploiting the business of carrying the commerce of the world outside of the United States. Has not the enlarging of our railroad systems and methods of transportation in the United States, and the development of our far western region been such as to occupy the capital and the energy of the people of the United States? But now, that having been done to the extent it has gone on, we are better prepared than we have been before to undertake the business of carrying foreign commerce.

OUR PRESENT HANDICAPS.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Washington is unquestionably right. The Senate will pardon me for not undertaking to go into these questions. I did not propose to make an argument or give a history of our decline in shipping. As the Senator understands, we are very limited in time. At some other time or on some other occasion I shall be very happy to discuss the question and go into it thoroughly. It is impossible to do it now. But the principal reason why we can not compete is that wages of foreign nations are lower than ours and that under the American flag an Italian or any other foreign sailor demands American wages. Another reason is that our sailors live 40 per cent better on board ship than any sailors on the face of the earth. Another reason is that every maritime nation on earth pays bounties or subsidies to its ships and ours pays none. We have allowed this to be done year after year without undertaking to save our own vessels except to a very limited degree two years ago in establishing a Postal Service.

AN OLD, TRIED POLICY.

Mr. HIGGINS (of Delaware). Mr. President, my extreme anxiety that the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye] shall be adopted leads me to say a few words. I hope that the amendment will be considered by our friends on the other side of the Chamber as a matter apart from the general policy of the bill. I wish to call the attention of the members of the Finance Committee who sit on the other side and the Senators generally to a matter that was a great surprise to me, that the discriminating duty provided in sections 14 and 15 of the bill is no novelty. I was surprised to know that there was such a provision in the bill. But it is time honored. It has come down in our tariff statutes as an inheritance from the founders of the Government.

BAD FAITH OF FOREIGN RIVALS.

I presume it is the very language in which such a discriminating duty was put in the first statute of this country, and which contributed so much to the building up of our merchant marine. The language of section 14, in the first four lines, is as follows:

"That a discriminating duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by law, shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States."

The remaining provisions of the section only supplement what is said there. It was under such a provision that our merchant marine was built up to its great extent before 1856 and 1857 and the disasters of the war. Great Britain finally accepted in 1849 the legislative offer which we had made them of a treaty to abandon those discriminating duties after they had in 1846 repealed the corn laws and gone to the principle of free trade. Then for the first time she abandoned her policy of holding for herself the trade of her own colonies, and also of maintaining discriminating duties in favor of her own ships. If she had done as we did, stopped there, the conditions in that respect between the two nations would have been equal, but when she and the United States together at the same time by treaty took off the discriminating duty against the ships of the other country respectively, Great Britain, if she did not then begin, at least kept up and maintained, and has maintained from that time to this, her system of bounties. We have not done so. We have therefore been playing against loaded dice.

We on this side thoroughly understand that the Democratic Party is committed in its policy against the principle of bounties, and that a vote in favor of such a policy could not be had.

My object in saying anything at all is to ask our friends on the other side of the Chamber whether they can not restore to sections 14 and 15, their original broad character and application by adopting the amendment of the Senator from Maine authorizing the Executive to terminate these treaties by notice, and thereby vivify these sections and restore these great means of support to our marine in the future.

("I think the only remedy is to place a duty upon all cargoes coming into American ports in foreign vessels sailing between American ports and ports over which they have no jurisdiction." Statement by James E. Flynn, deputy United States shipping commissioner at New Orleans, before the Merchant Marine Commission, 1904.)

GOOD OLD AMERICAN REMEDY.

If that is done, I think we will have taken by far the longest step toward the restoration of the American merchant marine. It can not be restored simply by the ability to build ships cheaper. That alone will not do it. It will scarcely contribute toward doing it. Neither can we hope to equalize the conditions between the merchant ships of the two countries by any expectation that the American sailor will accept as low wages and as poor living as the foreign sailor. As I have already said, we can not hope for a bounty to meet the subsidies of foreign nations; but here is this good old American remedy against which the Democratic Party is not committed, and by which they can give a great boon to the people of the United States, in all parts and in all sections, and to our whole country.

OUR RAILWAY DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY (of Connecticut). Mr. President, I wish to touch upon a single feature of this case, and to call attention to a single consideration. I hear an implied reproach to this country in that it has not its proper numerical proportion of shipping. I am not troubled about it at all. The American Nation has used its capital and put forth its power where it could be done to the very best advantage.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. Squire] has referred to this. We are not upon the ocean in our numerical proportion, because in that we are following the free-trade doctrine—that is to say, we take where we can get a thing cheapest. The carrying can be done cheaper by Norwegians and Italians and other seamen, at a third of what Americans will work for, and the men who build those foreign ships are working for about one-half or two-thirds what the American shipbuilders will work for. So the ships are cheaper, the wages are cheaper, the food and clothing given sailors are cheaper, the officers are paid figures which make you ashamed when you ask them on shipboard what they get.

What have we done? Where are we using our power and our money in that general field of commerce? We have about 171,000 miles of railway. By Poor's Manual they are worth $11,000,000,000. The figures are beyond the capacity of the human intellect to properly grasp and appreciate. Say that our railways carry freight at twice the speed of a mercantile marine; I am told by Mulhall in his Dictionary of Statistics, by which I have just refreshed my memory, that British merchant steamships cost from £16 to £24 per ton. We will average it at $100 a ton. The ten thousand million dollars, then, divided by $100 gives us the money equivalent of 100,000,000 tons of shipping. Great Britain has 7,000,000 tons of shipping. Converting our railroads into shipping, we have fifteen times as much as the mercantile marine of Great Britain.

Mr. SQUIRE. In tonnage.

Mr. HAWLEY. In tonnage. Our railways represent in tonnage fifteen times as much and freight trains run twice as fast as the average merchant ships sail. Our railways represent practically thirty times the mercantile tonnage of Great Britain upon the seas. That is the reason we are not upon the sea with our ships; we are doing better. While we are worrying ourselves over the statistics of international commerce, much exploited and vastly magnified in importance, we are adding fifteen or eighteen millions of inhabitants to our population in this decade, and adding within 10 years past from three to ten thousand miles of railway to our splendid system.

The United States is not fooling away its time in this country, sir. We are far and away the most powerful and magnificent nation.

TIME TO CONSIDER SHIPPING.

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me, I will ask him whether he does not think it is about time now for us to commence to agitate the question of going into foreign commerce?

Mr. HAWLEY. I should be very glad if we had more shipping; but you can not force the American when he is making 6 per cent in one pursuit to change to another and be satisfied with 3 per cent. Our time will come, probably, to take our share of international carrying. We could have a great deal more of it now if we followed the course of other nations, notably free-trade Great Britain, and protected our shipping by bounties and otherwise. Great Britain, as I have said many times, is the most violently protected country in the world when you come to properly understand her policy. In the matter of salt, I gave an example of it in previous remarks.

SHIPOWNER AND SHIPBUILDER.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there always seems to be in the popular conception of this subject great confusion between the shipbuilder and the shipowner. We hear it constantly said upon the stump that we have been giving protection to our shipping for all these years and yet see the manner in which it has declined. The remedy proposed on the other side, by the free trader, is to give us free ships, to allow us to buy ships wherever we choose.

Now, the shipbuilder is one person, the shipowner is another. We have always given protection to our shipbuilders. From that follows no protection to the shipowner, and we have given no protection to the shipowner. If you were to have free ships to-morrow it would not affect the shipowner particularly, because he would still have to compete with the high protection which is given by all other countries, and particularly by England, to the shipowners of their countries. When England entered upon her policy of free ships, which was a crude and merely nominal move, most of our tonnage was in wood, and the result of her free-ship policy at that time was to transfer very largely the building of ships to this country. I think that act was passed about 1849, and, by 1852, 60 per cent of the new English wooden tonnage was built in this country.

The question that is involved here is a wholly different one. It has nothing to do with shipbuilding or with free ships. It is a question whether we shall give to our shipowners the same advantages that all other countries give to theirs. We do protect them in the coastwise trade, and that trade is enormous. But aside from that we give our shipowners absolutely no protection, neither subsidy, discriminating duties, nor discriminating rates of insurance as Lloyd's does, nor premiums on iron ships. We give them nothing. With the higher wages which they are obliged to pay to their seamen, they are simply driven from the sea. Here in the bill is a clause giving distinctly discriminating duties in favor of the American ship and the American shipowner.

TO REVITALIZE A TRADITIONAL PRINCIPLE.

Every man in the Senate will vote for that clause, and yet I suppose the Democratic Party will decline to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which alone can make that clause efficient or effective in any way. In other words, all of us, Democrats and Republicans, recognize that traditional principle of the country in that clause, and we do not allow ourselves to make it effective. The question of free ship or protected shipbuilding is one thing; the question of protecting ship owning is another. This involves the question whether we shall encourage our merchant marine as it has been the traditional policy of the country always to do.

WE GAVE SUBSTANCE FOR SHADOW.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye] pointed out how we began it in the beginning of our Government, and how the tonnage rose under it. After the War of 1812, which, of course, had the effect of breaking up our merchant marine very largely and breaking up our carrying trade, we returned to our old discriminating policy, and our proportion of the carrying trade rose by leaps and bounds again, just as it did after the Revolution. We had given it away by these treaties, and other countries, while they had given us the same thing by the treaties, had been very careful to provide similar discriminations for their own merchant marine by subsidies, by bounties, or by discriminations at Lloyd's, which have already been pointed out by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when all of us are prepared to vote for the principle we ought also to be prepared to vote for the amendment which shall make the principle effective.

FOREIGN EVASION OF TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I like the principle of this amendment. I believe there is no party committed against it. A similar proposition, precisely the same in effect, will be found in the acts of the First Congress of the United States. It worked well then, but we gave it away by treaties. These treaties have been substantially violated. We are under no obligation in consequence of those treaties, because all of the important nations which entered into them have subsidized their carrying trade, which is a violation of the principle, and we ought to take some notice of it, at least.

I think the granting of a subsidy by foreign countries to their carrying trade is a violation of the treaties which were made to abrogate this differential duty, because it is the same in principle. They having taken another mode of reaching the same result, I think it is the duty of the United States to return to the original proposition. At all events, it ought to apply it at once, without regard to notice, to those nations which have subsidized their carrying trade and subsidized their shipping, because they have violated the treaty. It is another way of getting at it.

The carrying trade is a very important matter. It is very important to the country now. It amounts to about $200,000,000 a year, I suppose. I do not know the exact amount. We are paying now in this country a very large amount for carrying on our foreign commerce. If we are opposed to the principle of subsidies, it seems to me that we ought to return to the principle established in the First Congress of the United States, which worked well, and which we have given away by treaties, of which foreign countries have taken advantage by subsidizing their lines. Our passenger ships running across the ocean a half century ago were driven off the line by British subsidies. The British have obtained and maintained control of the carrying trade, which is exceedingly important. Two hundred million dollars a year is a great drain on our people, and if it can be recovered by legitimate legislation I think it ought to be done.

No one will pretend that the fathers of the Constitution, many of whom were in the First Congress, would violate the spirit of that instrument. I think to return to the teachings of the fathers is a very good thing in many cases. I think the departure from the principles which they laid down in the beginning in the legislation they started has produced most of the calamities from which we are now suffering in many respects. If the Senator from Maine will modify his amendment so that it shall apply to all countries subsidizing the vessels conducting their carrying trade it might go into effect at once. It is not in bad faith. It is bad faith in them, however, after we made treaties with them giving up the differential duty, to adopt another mode of obtaining an undue advantage. I hope the amendment will be adopted, but if it is not adopted as it is I hope the Senator from Maine will modify it so that it shall apply to those countries which subsidize their carrying trade.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye].

Mr. CULLOM. I should be very glad to have the amendment stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated, at the request of the Senator from Illinois.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 14 add the following:

"Until after January 1, 1896; and notice of this provision shall be given all nations before the 31st day of December next."

In section 15, line 2, after the word "treaty," insert:

"Hereafter made and ratified."

At the end of section 16 add:

"Until after January 1, 1896, and notice of this provision shall be given all nations before the 31st day of December, 1894."

Mr. SHERMAN (of Ohio). I should like to have the sections read as they will read if amended.

Mr. FRYE. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the amendment simply has one effect and nothing more. It provides that the discriminating duty provided for in section 14 shall extend to all goods imported in foreign vessels, one year's notice being given for the purpose of terminating existing treaties in that regard. That is all there is to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an interesting and very wide-reaching proposition. It seems to me that to repeal all our commercial treaties because all our commercial treaties contain the general right to carry both imports and exports of the two countries, respectively, without studying these treaties a little further would be rather a wide-reaching proposition. I should like to have the proposition of the Senator from Maine referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations to see precisely its effect.

The Senator from Maine is a member of the committee and I should like to study the matter with him. At present I am not prepared, at wholesale and without further study, to repeal treaties which have many provisions in them that we deem important to our interests, because if we repeal a single clause in a treaty it abrogates the whole treaty at the will of the other party. That probably would be the effect of deranging our commercial relations with all nations. I certainly should not like to vote for a proposition as broad and sweeping as the one before us without further study than I have been able to give it now or anyone else has been able to give it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the yeas and nays. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that there are very few treaties, indeed, to be affected; that the greater portion has been yielded by legislation. We enacted certain legislation which should become law when certain other nations accepted it. Great Britain accepted the final legislation in 1849, and the amendment provides a discriminating duty where no legislation or treaty prevents it.

The Senator from Ohio will not find many treaties to be affected. Then I think it only gives notice for repealing this particular clause. After the vote has been taken, if the amendment is not adopted, and I suppose it will not be, I shall have the amendment go before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that if he is going to send the matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations, for many reasons he had better withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

ORIGINAL PROPOSITION CORRECT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be very glad to study out the matter with the Senator from Maine, and where treaties can be repealed without involving other interests of American citizens, I might be willing to adopt the principle. The original proposition was the correct one. It must be remembered that at that time the United States had a great many wooden ships and had the advantage of almost all other nations in the carrying trade. Our American vessels were carrying at a profit and safely and probably at as cheap rates as any other all the commerce, the exports and imports, of the United States. But it would be pretty difficult now to make provisions to carry all the immense exports and imports, which to-day amount to over $1,000,000,000. Therefore we might be legislating blindly, in the dark. If the proposition is not adopted I think it will be well to refer the whole subject matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye] demands the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The demand is withdrawn. The amendment has already been declared not adopted. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

("I am a believer, first, in discriminating duties, and, next, in very liberal mail contracts." Statement made by C. E. Kremer, admiralty attorney, at Chicago, before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904).)

SENATOR ELKINS ADVOCATED DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

In February, 1896, Senator Elkins, of West Virginia, introduced a bill to put vitality into the suspended discriminating duty law, and this bill, with amendments, he reintroduced in 1897.

WIDESPREAD DEMAND FOR DISCRIMINATING DUTIES IN 1896.

During the early part of 1896 resolutions were incorporated in a dozen or more State platforms, Republican and Democratic, in favor of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our marine in foreign trade, Massachusetts, under the leadership of Senator LODGE, setting the pace. This was followed by the adoption of the following plank in the Republican national platform at the convention at St. Louis in 1896:

"We favor restoring the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in foreign trade, so that American ships—the product of American labor employed in American shipyards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans—may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce."

In his letter accepting his party's nomination for the Presidency, William McKinley made the following declaration:

"The declaration of the Republican platform in favor of the upbuilding of our merchant marine has my hearty approval. The policy of discriminating duties in favor of our shipping, which prevailed in the early years of our history, should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas is fully attained. We should no longer contribute directly or indirectly to the maintenance of the colossal marine of foreign countries, but provide an efficient and complete marine of our own."

If party platforms count for anything with the people, then it should be said that a majority of them, in 1896, by their votes recorded themselves in favor of the plank and in behalf of the candidate, above quoted, and there are those who contend that, once the people have indorsed, by the election of the candidates, the platform upon which they sought support, that platform becomes a mandate from the people, as well as a solemn pledge of the party adopting it, and whose nominees are placed in a position to put them into effect. There is this to be further said: The only time in the history of the Republican Party that it ever adopted a plank specifically defining the method by which it would build up our shipping in foreign trade, was in 1896, in favor of discriminating duties. Moreover, that party has never, since that time, by any declaration, either repudiated the pledge in favor of discriminating duties, or declared in favor of any other method for the restoration of our ships to the seas.

GREAT SPEECH BY SENATOR ELKINS IN FAVOR OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Although his party associates were lukewarm regarding discriminating duties, after the election of 1896, Senator Elkins was not. He persisted in his advocacy, and the first bill introduced in the Senate at the extra session of Congress called in 1897, was that of Senator Elkins in behalf of discriminating duties. Not since the days of the First Congress, and the brilliant and successful advocacy of discriminating duties by James Madison, has so complete and unanswerable a speech on this subject been made. Much less than half of it follows, but enough of it is presented to show that Senator Elkins had a thorough grasp of his subject, a masterly manner of marshaling his facts and his arguments, and a sincerity of conviction permeating his speech based upon the magical results that followed the original adoption of this policy in the First Congress. No student of American shipping history should fail to carefully read this speech:

SPEECH OF SENATOR STEPHEN B. ELKINS, OF WEST VIRGINIA, APRIL 5, 1897.

[See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 580–600.]

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, under a proper policy of encouragement to American shipping the United States, with its 8,000 miles of seacoast, its navigable rivers and lake coast, fine harbors, variety of climate, productive capacity, rapidly increasing population, its position on the globe—Asia on one side with 600,000,000 and Europe on the other side with 400,000,000 of people—should be the leading commercial and maritime power of the world.

This would be the proud position of the United States to-day had protection to American interests on the sea granted by the founders of the Government in the early legislation of Congress been continued. Our progress on land in a century is unsurpassed in the history of material development, while our progress in shipping has languished under the policy of maritime reciprocity until our flag is unknown on many seas, and with some nations has almost become a myth.

No nation has ever been truly great nor an important factor in the affairs of the world unless it has been great on the sea. The United States can not reach its full growth and measure of progress until its shipping and commerce are relatively equal to its industries on land.

SHIPPING AS A RESOURCE OF DEFENSE.

Apart from the importance of encouraging shipping purely as a branch of industry that brings returns to those engaged in it, employment for labor, and consumption of raw and manufactured material, it has an added importance and becomes a matter of national concern from the standpoint of defense.

In a report to Congress on commerce and navigation made by Mr. Jefferson as Secretary of State, in 1793, speaking of navigation, he said:

"Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches upon it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level; and in times of war, that is to say, when those nations who may be our principal carriers shall be at war with each other, if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

"But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance."

OPPOSITION AND DIFFICULTIES TO BE OVERCOME.

Any plan or policy that may be devised for building up American shipping on the high seas will meet with serious opposition from the shipowning nations of the world. Even among our own people opposition will be developed. But we must not be deterred from the performance of a plain duty because of difficulties and opposition at home and abroad. Difficulties lie in the pathway of progress. No great thing comes to a nation, a community, or an individual without effort and difficulties to overcome.

The United States has a common interest in the oceans and seas of the world, and should share in the fruits and benefits that arise from occupying them with its vessels; especially should it have the largest share in carrying its own foreign trade. Because of the opposition of Great Britain and countries which control the shipping of the world and enjoy what we once had, we must not surrender our rights on the seas and fail to reach out and take again what naturally belongs to us.

FOREIGN CAPITAL FOCUSED AGAINST AMERICAN INTERESTS.

I do not underestimate the influence and power of the forces arrayed against American shipping, which have helped to bring it to its present deplorable condition, and which will fight to prevent its restoration. These forces are united, vigorous, and determined, while we are divided as to policy. It is hard to build up a business in opposition to one already established and where the advantages are massed on one side. A thousand millions of invested foreign capital will be focused against any attempt to build up American interests on the high seas; this capital will have its influence; already it is being felt. Behind foreign shipping there is not only great capital but a great interest to maintain, and in order to hold its present position this interest will use every means in its power and attempt to mold public opinion against any plan or policy of aid to shipping the United States may adopt.

CONTINUOUS BRITISH RIVALRY INEVITABLE.

The greatest contest will be with England for commercial supremacy. Great Britain will resist every step in the direction of restoring American shipping. She would not be true to her people, her commercial instincts, traditions, and interests were she not to make every effort in her power to maintain her supremacy on the seas. What agriculture is to the United States shipping is to England, and England will use all her endeavors, through wise statesmanship and diplomacy, to protect the same. Against this there can be no reasonable objection on our part.

It is the province of English statesmanship to maintain the commercial supremacy of Great Britain on the high seas. It is manifest destiny that the United States shall dispute this supremacy and with its position and advantages control not only its own but the larger part of the carrying trade of the world.

We may agree with England on most subjects, but on the subject of shipping and commerce we never can. Lord Robert Cecil, the present Lord Salisbury and prime minister of England, in the English Parliament, early in 1862, said:

"Everyone who watches the current of history must know that the Northern States of America never can be our true friends, for this simple reason: Not merely because the newspapers write at each other, or that there are prejudices on both sides, but because we are rivals; rivals politically, rivals commercially. We aspire to the same position. We both aspire to the government of the seas. We are both manufacturing people, and in every port, as in every court, we are rivals to each other."

This is a true and candid statement of the facts as they exist and will continue to exist. We can not, and should not, attempt to conceal them. Great Britain will not easily give up what she has gained on the sea in 200 years. She knows that a struggle with the United States for commercial supremacy is inevitable and is preparing for it. England, an island in area not greater than one of our States, is at once the child and ruler of the seas.

Sir Walter Raleigh said:

"Whosoever commands the sea commands the trade; whosoever commands the trade of the world commands the riches of the world, and, consequently, the world itself."

LEGISLATION FAVORING DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

In order to a better understanding of this question, a brief history of the legislation of Congress on the subject of shipping and the results that have followed will be helpful.

It is a historical fact that while we were colonies of Great Britain it was the policy of the mother country to discourage manufacturing, shipping, and shipbuilding in the colonies, in order that these branches of industry might be better fostered at nome.

About this time the King of England declared that nothing but sloops should be built in the American colonies. They were the smallest sized vessels and of little consequence in the foreign trade. All other ships engaged in commerce between the two countries had to be built in England.

For six years previous to the adoption of the Constitution—that is, from 1783 to 1789—shipping in our foreign trade was for the most part in the hands of the shipowners of Great Britain.

A COURAGEOUS POLICY.

The second act passed by Congress, introduced by Madison, was a tariff act, and provided protection to manufacturing. In this act protection to shipping was also provided by increasing duties on certain goods imported in foreign vessels. By the same act it was also provided that the duties on goods imported from the East Indies should be 12½ per cent ad valorem, which was about double the duties on the same class of goods brought in American ships. The following figures, taken from the report of Commissioner of Navigation William W. Bates, show the difference in duties on teas under this act:

Duties on different kinds of tea (per pound).

Manner of importation.	Bohea.	Souchong.	Hyson.	Other green.
From China or India in American ships..	$0.06	$0.10	$0.10	$0.12
From Europe in American vessels.....	.08	.13	.26	.16
In any other way than as above.....	.15	.22	.45	.27

This table shows that the duties were more than doubled when teas were imported in foreign ships.

Mr. Bates adds:

"As a general protection to the marine in other trades than that to China and India, a rebate of 10 per cent was allowed on importations by vessels of our own. At the time of this statute it was the rule in foreign commerce for the merchants to own their shipping. But our merchants, whether owners or not, were directly protected by a system of credit for the payment of duties above $50 in amount as follows: On articles of West India produce, 4 months; on Madeira wines, 12 months; on teas, 2 years; on all other goods, 6 months."

This was a bold policy on the part of a nation in its infancy, and in face of the opposition of the foreign shipping, but it seemed to be the most effective way open to our fathers for building up ocean carrying.

The next measure of protection was imposing tonnage duties by act of Congress approved July 20, 1789, under which the duties were as follows:

On all vessels American built, owned by citizens, or foreign built, owned by citizens, the 29th of May, 1789, and while owned by citizens, per ton $0.06
On all vessels hereafter built in the United States, partly or wholly owned by foreigners, per ton ..... .30
On all other ships or vessels, at the rate of, per ton ..... .50

Other advantages were allowed American shipowners in the payment of tonnage dues. They had to pay only once a year, while the owners of foreign vessels had to pay on every arrival.

By another act of Congress, approved September 1, 1789, it was provided that none but American-built vessels should fly the American flag. This law is still in force.

Additional protection was granted to American shipowners and shipbuilders by an act approved July 4, 1794. This act provided for the increase of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels not of the United States. Section 4 of this act is as follows:

"That an addition of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise which, after the said last day of June instant, shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States."

The bill under consideration is in principle the same as this section.

PROTECTION TO OUR COASTWISE TRADE.

By act of Congress approved February 18, 1793, and followed by another on the same subject approved March 3, 1817, it is provided that none but American-built vessels shall be used in the coastwise, river, and lake trade of the United States. This has remained substantially the law for more than 100 years. Under these acts no foreign-built vessel can engage in our coastwise trade, and American vessels in such trade have absolute protection and no competition from foreign vessels. All of these acts except the one passed in 1817 were approved by Washington as President.

Congress in the first five years of its existence passed three acts to protect shipping, each one confirming the wisdom of the preceding one, and all contributing to increase shipping and shipbuilding in the early history of the Government.

These acts, while increasing shipping in our foreign commerce, had the effect to decrease British shipping correspondingly, as will be seen by the following table showing the tonnage of British vessels admitted to American ports in the early stage of discriminating legislation:

	Tonnage.
1790	218,914
1791	210,618
1794	37,058
1795	27,097
1796	19,669

SOME RESULTS OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The beneficial results of discriminating duties in building up our shipping will be found in the records of the Treasury Department. From these records it appears from 1789 to 1800 the carrying of our imports in American ships increased from 17½ per cent to 92 per cent, and of our exports from 30 per cent to 88 per cent; and from 1800 to 1810 this increase was substantially maintained, making the average of our foreign commerce carried in American ships for the period from 1800 to 1810, 9½ per cent of our imports and 87 per cent of our exports.

By an act of Congress approved in 1804 tariff duties were increased 2½ per cent, and again it was provided that "an addition of 10 per cent should be made to the said additional duty in respect to all goods imported in ships or vessels not of the United States." Owing to foreign wars, the United States did not keep up the average from 1801 to 1805 of the carriage in American ships of our foreign commerce, but during this adverse period, made so by war between France and England and other wars, American ships carried 89.8 per cent of our imports and 86 per cent of our exports. From 1805 to 1810 our proportion of American carriage in the foreign trade increased until it reached 92½ per cent of the imports and 88¼ per cent of the exports.

In 1810 our share in the carrying trade of the world was about as great as that of England. Alarmed at the successful progress of American shipping under discriminating duties, England brought on the War of 1812, it is said, partly for the purpose of breaking it down.

On the whole, from 1810 to 1830 there was but little decline in American carrying in our foreign trade.

During the War of 1812 our proportion of carrying in our foreign trade only declined to 58 per cent of our imports and 51 per cent of our exports, which was the lowest point it had reached under the policy of discrimination; but this loss was recovered in the following five years and maintained until 1830.

The policy of discriminating duties not only increased our shipping, but it built up a merchant marine and a Navy which stood us well in hand in the War of 1812. If our fathers had not, in their wisdom, provided for the protection of shipping immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, our carrying would have largely remained in the hands of foreign shipowners, and in the War of 1812 we would have been without a merchant marine and without a Navy or seamen to man it—simply powerless and defenseless on the high seas—and we would have suffered defeat instead of achieving a great victory. It is a remarkable fact that Madison in the First Congress introduced the bill that protected shipping, its passage being urged on the ground that it would build up a merchant marine and a Navy which would be useful in time of war, and during the War of 1812 he was President and used the Navy built up under his bill to save the United States from defeat.

YIELDING TO BRITISH PERSUASIONS.

After the close of the War of 1812 there grew up in the United States a party desirous of conciliating England. The President and Congress lent willing ears to the importunities of this party and the proposal of English statesmen to remove restrictions against foreigners and foreign-built vessels in the American carrying trade. All the arguments for free trade in shipping, maritime reciprocity, and neighborly feeling in doing business, good in theory and on paper, were brought forth at the time. Accordingly Congress passed an act, approved March 4, 1815, which inaugurated what was known as "limited maritime reciprocity," and thus took away some of the protection to shipping granted under the laws of 1789 and 1794.

This was the first direct attack on discriminating duties. It was soon followed by a treaty between the United States and England, negotiated July 3, 1815, to regulate commerce between the two countries.

In 1817 Congress passed another act of reciprocity, which had the effect of further impairing protection to American shipping. In 1819 our shipping had fallen lower than it had been for 22 years.

FINAL ACT OF RUINOUS RECIPROCITY.

The "free-freighting act" of 1828, as it was called, was in the interest of foreign shipowners. This act and the subsequent treaties about accomplished the ruin of our carrying in the foreign trade. While advantage of it was soon taken by a few of the lesser maritime nations, it was not availed of by the more powerful, notably Great Britain, for many years, in consequence of which our losses of carriage were more gradual and less noticed than they would have been had the discrimination ceased upon its adoption. This act is even now in force, and nations are not yet done asking for its benefits. The treaties following it have brought us not one, but destroyed all advantages we had under protection by discriminating duties.

During the four years of the Civil War American ships lost in carrying our imports about 30 per cent and our exports 45 per cent. From the close of the war until 1890 these losses have been about 14 per cent in carrying imports and 17 per cent of exports.

The following table shows the losses in our carrying before, during, and since the war:

Period.	Imports.	Exports.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Before the war, 31 years, from 1829 to 1860	33.60	14.20
During the war, 4 years	30.10	46.00
Since 1865, 25 years	13.30	17.07
Percentage of carriage, 1830	93.60	86.30
Percentage of carriage, 1890	16.60	9.03
Loss from 1830 to 1890	77.00	77.27

This table covers 60 years of the period of maritime reciprocity under treaties with foreign countries.

Notwithstanding the War of 1812, under the policy of discriminating duties American carrying continued to prosper until England became alarmed at our great progress. Having failed to break down our shipping by war, she persuaded the United States to adopt maritime reciprocity. In 1827, the year before the final act of Congress was passed for the abandonment of the policy of discriminating duties, the London Times said:

"It is not our habit to sound the tocsin on light occasions, but we conceive it to be impossible to view the existing state of things in this country without more than apprehension and alarm. Twelve years of peace; and what is the situation in Great Britain? The shipping interest, the cradle of our navy, is half ruined. Our commercial monopoly no longer exists. We have closed the western Indies against America from feelings of commercial rivalry. Its active seamen have already engrossed an important branch of our carrying trade to the East Indies. Her starred flag is now conspicuous on every sea and will soon defy our thunder."

Yet in face of this admission and confession of the success of the United States on the sea and growth of American shipping under discriminating duties the next year Congress was induced to give up the last remnant of protection to shipping.

After 30 years of trial and experience under protection and discriminating duties, Daniel Webster said, in 1825:

"We have a commerce which leaves no sea unexplored; navies which take no law from superior force."

Discriminating duties were partially repealed in 1815, and their suspension was made possible on certain conditions by the act of 1828.

Great Britain to-day controls 56 per cent of the carrying trade, owns half the floating property of the globe, unfurls her flag over one-quarter of its area, and rules nearly one-third of its population. Could this position have been achieved or maintained save by first excluding foreign-built vessels from her commerce and by discriminating duties, together with subsidies and mail pay on an enormous scale, and other forms of support?

England, under this system of laws in full force for about 130 years, laid the foundation for the present prosperous condition of her shipping and commercial supremacy. We are told that England has free trade in shipping and maritime reciprocity, and as a result controls one-half the carrying of the world, and therefore this policy is best for the United States. But the conditions are not the same. In the matter of shipping the United States is in one sense now where England was when she enacted her navigation laws, and we are not as well off as when we adopted discriminating duties in 1794. If the United States had enjoyed for 130 years the benefits of such navigation laws and had followed them by discriminating duties, large subsidies, and mail pay, then our people might be willing to adopt free trade in shipping. We would then start in the struggle on equal footing. Great Britain adopted free trade on land before she adopted it on the sea, and the United States would do well not to adopt free trade in shipping until after it is tried on land.

("Promoted by wise legislation, our system [of discriminating duties] had proved a complete success. In 1827 we carried 94 per cent of our imports and 87 per cent of our exports. At this period, with threatened reciprocity, the decadence of our merchant marine began, and the retrogression has continued without interruption. To-day [1904] we carry only about 8 per cent of our aggregate imports and exports. * * * For 10 years prior to 1830 the average British arrivals in our ports had been about 76,000 tons. In the year following reciprocity British arrivals amounted to 144,000 tons, and during the next 10 years the average of British arrivals was over 210,000 tons annually, an average British increase in our own ports of over 300 per cent * * *." R. G. Bickford, attorney, Newport News, Va.)

THE INTRENCHED POSITION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The advantages that help to perpetuate England's maritime supremacy are:

1. Her enormous tonnage; more than the combined tonnage of all other nations.

Supported by—

(a) The British Lloyd system of surveys and classifications, discriminating in favor of British-built vessels. Consuls can act as Lloyd's agents everywhere.

(b) Discriminations of Association of Marine Insurance Underwriters consequent upon Lloyd's classification of risks.

(c) Mail subsidies amounting to about $4,000,000 annually, on which Great Britain is content to suffer a seeming loss of about $2,500,000 annually.

(d) Subventions to fast steamship lines as armed cruisers, about $250,000 annually.

(e) Ships manned more cheaply; less number of sailors and low wages.

(f) Ships supplied more cheaply.

(g) Ships surer of cargoes, having markets everywhere.

(h) Ships, passenger and freight, enjoy prestige for safety.

(i) Tax rate and insurance on ships very low.

(j) Income from ships high in proportion to English rate of interest.

(k) Ships' supplies taken from goods in bond; i. e., duty free.

(l) Dock equipment for repairing finest in the world.

(m) Less cost of repairs, low price of labor, and low rent of docks.

2. National pride and interest in all marine affairs. The executive practically with full power in matters of subsidies and aid to shipping.

3. The possession of the "beaten track" of international commerce.

4. An enormous foreign trade, extending around the world.

5. A thoroughly established international credit and banking system, accommodating the debtor nations. It is said that the capital and surplus of international banking houses of London alone, which aid British commerce throughout the world, amount to nearly $400,000,000, or five times the capital and surplus of the national banks of the city of New York.

6. An unrivaled consular system.

7. A board of trade that is national in its character, with full executive power, while the United States has not even a department of commerce.

8. A vast system of submarine and overland electric cables, which help to make England the commercial brain and center of the globe.

9. A round-the-world Empire, which, with its growing system of politico-commercial railways, canals, and steamship lines, under the patronage of the imperial treasury, have long since unified its colonial dominions and holds the world's commerce in a British net of steam, steel, and electricity.

10. A navy which is a guaranty of safety in time of international complications.

11. England's position as the great trade center to which all commercial highways lead.

12. The persistent and seemingly incurable indifference of Americans toward even the maintenance of the shipping we have, let alone increasing it. England's shipping grows by reason of our apathy.

To all these should be added—

The wage-earning power of the merchant marine of Great Britain, amounting to about $75,000,000 annually.

The freight and passenger earning power, estimated at about $500,000,000 annually.

The consumption of coal, iron, and steel for her ships.

The profits from shipbuilding and ship repairing.

BRITISH LLOYD'S REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

Lloyd's Register has been known for the last 60 or 70 years as one of the chief agencies used in building up shipping in England and breaking down that of other countries, notably that of the United States. While it is the business of this association to inspect, rate, and classify British and foreign ships, yet they do not insure hulls and cargoes. The business of insurance, however, is conducted by its members individually, entirely outside of and separate from the corporation. Lloyd's Register has agents in all the ports of the world, and they give preference in inspection, rating, and classification to British ships. This enables British ships not only to be insured cheaper, but to get readier cargoes, while American vessels have to wait for cargoes which are charged higher insurance on account of the ships having a lower classification. Through this system of inspecting, rating, and insurance American sailing vessels have been driven out of many ports of the world, especially our own, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. There are instances, owing to these discriminations, where American vessels have waited months for cargoes.

The British Lloyd's Register is one of the most important aids to British shipping.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The objections made to restoring the policy of discriminating duties are:

(a) Treaties with foreign countries providing for maritime reciprocity stand in the way.

(b) Such a policy, if established, would provoke retaliation on the part of Great Britain and other shipowning countries.

(c) It is antiquated, narrow, illiberal, and has long since been discarded by the United States and European countries.

(d) The conditions are not the same now as when it was in force in the early history of the Government.

The policy of discriminating duties is only a form of protection; indeed, protection is based on discrimination. We protect our manufacturing industries by discriminating in their favor and against foreign manufactured products. If the United States had 60 years ago abandoned the policy of protection, and it should be proposed now to revive the law and restore duties by imposing a tax of 50 per cent on the value of one-half the goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries, the same or stronger arguments would be made in opposition to such a bill than are now made against restoring discriminating duties in favor of American shipping. Such a proposition would be set down as narrow, illiberal, and antiquated. It would be said at once that we would have instant retaliation from the nations of Europe which we could not stand. But the nations of Europe do not retaliate now. Yet the people of the United States know and believe after 100 years of trial that protection and levying duties on foreign products has been in many ways of incalculable benefit to the country. But, Mr. President, the protection that I ask for American shipping and that comes from discriminating duties is not the kind that costs individuals or the Government anything.

("I admit that laying 50 cents on foreign vessels and but 6 cents on our own is a regulation by which owners of American shipping will put a considerable part of the difference in their pockets. This, sir, I consider as a sacrifice of interest to policy; the sacrifice is but small, but I would not contend for it if we did not stand in need of maritime improvement. Were it not for the necessity we are under of having some naval (maritime?) strength, I would be an advocate for throwing wide open the doors of our commerce to the world and making no discrimination in favor of our own citizens. But we have maritime dangers to guard against, and we can be secured from them in no other way than by having a navy (marine) and seamen of our own; these can only be obtained by giving a preference. I admit it is a tax, and a tax upon our produce, but it is a tax we must pay for the national security. I reconcile it to the interest of the United States that this sacrifice should be made; by it we shall be able to provide the means of defense, and by being prepared to repel danger is the most likely way to avoid it. This tax, therefore, may prevent the horror of a war and secure to us that respect and attention which we merit." James Madison, speech in Congress, 1789.)

IMPORTANT BRITISH TESTIMONY.

The great free trader, Adam Smith, advocated prohibition and discrimination in favor of British shipping. In his Wealth of Nations he says:

"There seems, however, to be two cases in which it will generally be advantageous to lay some burden upon foreign for the encouragement of domestic industry. The first is when some particular industry is necessary for the defense of the country. The defense of Great Britain, for example, depends very much upon the number of its sailors and shipping. The act of navigation, therefore, very properly endeavors to give the sailors and shipping of Great Britain the monopoly of the trade of their own country, in some cases, by absolute prohibitions, and in others by heavy burdens upon the shipping of foreign countries."

A British historian, in speaking of the provision in the navigation law of Great Britain which prohibited goods being imported into England except in vessels belonging to British owners and built by British builders, says:

"The result of that act far transcended the wildest dream of Lombard and Venetian avarice or the grandest schemes of Spanish and Portuguese conquest. It not only secured to the people who enacted it the greatest share of the world's carrying trade, but the trade also knew its master and followed with becoming servility."

Mr. McGregor, secretary to the British Board of Trade and author of McGregor's Statistics, in discussing the policy of discriminating duties and its effect on the shipping of other nations when in force, says:

"In the American navigation laws countervailing duties were imposed upon all foreign vessels trading to the United States of half a dollar a ton duty beyond what should at any time be paid by American ships; and, further, that goods imported in foreign vessels should pay a duty of 10 per cent over and above what was payable on the same description of goods when imported in American vessels. These countervailing duties were directed against the navigation of Great Britain and grounded on the same principles as the British navigation laws. Various measures to counteract the American system were devised by the British Government, and they failed upon the principles of our continuing to maintain in full force the navigation laws. To all intelligent men it became evident that we had engaged in an unequal struggle, and that the real effect of our policy was to give a bounty on the importation of the manufactured goods of other countries into the United States, to the gradual exclusion both of our manufactures and ships from the ports of America."

This is the testimony of an eminent British authority on the subject of discriminating duties and their beneficial effects on American shipping, and should carry conviction to all Americans entertaining any doubt on the subject.

WHAT MUST BE DONE FOR SHIPPING.

American carrying must be built up under the operation of law, a law that will discriminate in favor of American ships in carrying our foreign trade, especially our imports. If we had abandoned 70 years ago the policy of excluding foreign-built vessels from our coastwise trade, that trade to-day would be largely in the hands of foreign shipowners and in a condition as deplorable as our ocean carrying. Had we continued the policy of protection to our carrying, shipping in our foreign trade to-day would be in as prosperous condition as our manufacturing interests. The policy of discriminating duties is not an experiment, it is not untried; on the contrary, it was on trial for a long period under the most unfavorable conditions and produced the best results.

RESULTS THAT WOULD FOLLOW THE RESTORATION OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

It is believed that the adoption of discriminating duties, with such supplemental legislation that might be found necessary in the light of experience, the results would be as beneficial as in the early history of the Government and felt at once. First, it would give us immediately a large share in carrying our foreign commerce, all of our imports and part of our exports, and a share in carrying the commerce of countries not owning ships. Second. It would increase shipbuilding; new shipyards would spring up on all our coasts, causing the expenditure of hundreds of millions of capital. Third. Shipbuilding would stimulate other industries of all kinds; it would give employment to thousands of skilled and other workmen. Fourth. It would save to the people of the United States annually nearly $100,000,000 now paid to foreign shipowners for carrying our imports, with the chance in a few years of saving another hundred millions by the increase of shipping and the carrying of a large part of the world's commerce in American bottoms. Fifth. It would not only build up shipping in the foreign trade, but it would be the means of extending our trade in the foreign markets of the world.

RETALIATION.

One of the reasons urged against the passage of the bill under consideration is that Great Britain and other ship-owning countries will retaliate. But just how or in what way the opponents of the bill do not clearly set forth. The damage to our shipping that might follow retaliation is imaginary. Under the operation of maritime reciprocity and neglect, we have scarcely any shipping left in our foreign trade. It would be far better to carry in American ships our imports or 50 per cent of our foreign commerce, which we would do under discriminating duties, with retaliation against us, than to carry only 11 per cent, as we do now, with no retaliation.

Washington said:

"There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation."

Great Britain will always do at the time whatever her statesmen may deem to be in her interest. If they should think retaliation the best weapon with which to oppose discriminating duties, they would adopt it and enforce it vigorously. But if Great Britain and other countries should adopt retaliation, how would that affect American carrying? It would take from American ships the slight part they now have in carrying exports from the United States, which is insignificant. Taking this small business from American ships by way of retaliation for adopting the policy of discriminating duties, could not prevent American ships from carrying nearly a thousand millions of imports from foreign countries, making their gross earnings a hundred millions per annum, whereas their earnings now amount only to about $20,000,000 per annum from carrying both our exports and imports.

In one sense the two hundred millions we pay to foreign shipowners is a loss to our people. It is unlike almost any other expenditure. Substantially we get nothing in return for it; nothing that adds to the wealth of the country. When we buy goods and products from other nations and pay gold for the same, we get the goods in return, and they constitute part of the wealth of the Nation. But when we pay out two hundred millions annually for ocean freight on goods we buy and sell, when we could keept it at home by paying it to American shipowners, we simply deplete the resources of the country and make the people poorer. One of the causes of the depression in business is due to the drain of two hundred millions of gold annually paid by the people of the United States to foreign steamship companies for ocean freights. No nation, however rich, can stand this great drain for a long time.

Ex-United States Commissioner of Navigation Capt. W. W. Bates, in his book, American Marine, published in 1892, on page 25, says:

"An amount of money not less than $4,500,000,000, or an average of $150,000,000 annually, for 30 years past, has been paid out to foreign ships for ocean transportation. To stop this drain nothing effective has been done, the political mind seeming to be fully occupied with other questions of local or secondary importance."

Thirty years is but a span in the life of a nation, yet we have paid, in this short period, nearly as much as the cost of our Civil War to foreign shipowners for carrying our exports and imports.

By restoring the policy of protection and discriminating duties adopted in the early history of the Government, and in force for 40 years, a large part of this vast sum could be saved to our people.

FREE SHIPS.

The policy of free ships, which is in substance the authority under law to buy foreign-built ships and admit them to American registry, is seriously urged as the best remedy to revive American shipping. Maritime reciprocity, which we have had for 70 years, is partial free trade in shipping. To adopt the policy of free ships would give us absolute free trade in shipping. We would then have a protective policy for industries on land, and for industries on the sea just the opposite. If it be true that shipping goes hand in hand with other industries and, in a certain sense, stimulates them, why should we not adopt the same policy as to shipping that we do as to industries on land? Why have one policy for industries on the sea and another for those on land? England's greatest industry is shipping, and she protects it by subsidies and in many other ways, and yet, in the face of this protection, we are asked to have free trade in shipping and no aid or protection as the best means to compete with England and revive American shipping.

So far as our shipbuilding interest is concerned, the free-ship policy would reduce the United States to a state of dependence and vassalage. If the United States had in the beginning adopted the policy of free trade instead of protection, on the ground that we should buy manufactured products abroad because we could get them cheaper, our manufacturing interests to-day would be in the deplorable condition our shipping is. But for the protective policy adopted in the early history of our Government, and adhered to since, we could not have built up our manufacturing interests. The object of imposing duties on foreign-made products was not only for the purpose of getting needed revenue to pay the expenses of the Government, but its greater and wider purpose was to build up the manufacturing interests so that we might be independent of all the world. The same rule applies to shipbuilding and shipping interests. Because we can buy ships cheaper from foreign shipbuilders is not a sufficient reason for doing so. If we should pursue this policy we never would build our own ships, we never would have a merchant marine or a navy.

We have had partial free trade in shipping for 70 years. We are now asked to adopt the policy of absolute free trade in shipping as a remedy to rescue American shipping from the condition it is in as a result of maritime reciprocity. Free trade in shipping is urged as a remedy for the evils brought on by partial free trade.

("It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force which will follow in the plan of indiscrimination. When once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantage to those who extinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions [and by subsidies, subventions, and bounties] as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions, or for our due share in the transportation of them, but to our own means of independence and the firm will use them." Report on the privileges and restrictions of the commerce of the United States in foreign countries, by Thomas Jefferson, while Secretary of State, 1793.)

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES THE WISER POLICY.

Foreign ships now carry nine-tenths of our foreign commerce. Free-ship advocates say that we should buy ships abroad to carry the one-tenth we now carry in American-built ships so as to increase shipping. Ex-Commissioner of Navigation Bates, in my opinion the best-informed man in the country on the subject of shipping, says in his repart for 1890:

"If ships were given American owners, they could not run them gainfully against subsidized, bounty-paid, insurance-protected, cheaper-manned European vessels, except on equalized footing all around."

He adds:

"Without protection our vessels can not get or hold competitive employment."

If we had 100 of the finest steamers afloat, we could not run them in competition with foreign ships. The conditions are not the same. We are not on an equal footing with Great Britain and other shipowning countries on the high seas. If we attempted to make conditions equal by subsidies and mail pay, the policy now adopted by Great Britain, we would be met with greater subsidies. So that it is not a question of free ships or cheap ships, but it is a question of getting business for ships after we have them. We can only do this by protection and discrimination, just as we do now and have for 100 years discriminated in favor of our industries on land against foreign industries.

By discriminating laws we make it profitable and in the interest of our people to buy home products and not foreign-made products. We must by a like policy make it profitable to American ships to carry our foreign commerce. Shipbuilding means shipowning. The nation that builds ships is always an owner of shps.

The mistake made by the United States for 70 years has been in treating shipping as a private industry and of no national concern; that it did not need encouragement and protection as industries on land; that maritime reciprocity and free carrying was all that was necessary to build it up. With Great Britain shipping has always been of national concern and national importance, and has received more protection and aid than any industry ever enjoyed in any country.

In discussing the subject of protection to English shipping, Mr. Blaine, in his celebrated reply to Mr. Gladstone in 1890, said:

"It will not escape Mr. Gladstone's keen observation that British interests in navigation flourish with less rivalry and have increased in greater proportion than any other of the great interests of the United Kingdom. I ask his candid admission that it is the one interest which England has protected steadily and determinedly, regardless of consistency and regardless of expense. Nor will Mr. Gladstone fail to note that navigation is the weakest of the great interests in the United States, because it is the one which the National Government has consistently refused to protect."

The United States has become independent of all the world in everything on land. We can produce all that is needful for the wants of a great people; but when we come to the sea, notwithstanding our coast line, our position, and natural advantages, we are helpless, impotent, and dependent

If we buy ships abroad, we have the ships, it is true, but as a nation we lose the money we pay for them, we lose the business of building the ships, the employment for our people by giving it to foreigners, and lose the market for the raw and manufactured products that enter into shipbuilding; we destroy our shipyards and become utterly dependent on foreign countries in one of the most important branches of industry. Even if we could buy ships cheaper abroad, in the long run it would pay us to build them at home. If the argument for free ships is good as a plan to build up our merchant marine, why should this plan not apply with equal force to building war ships? Why have different plans for interests so nearly alike? If it is better to buy ships abroad to build up our merchant marine, it would be better for the same reason to buy our war ships abroad and close up all American shipyards.

A MERCHANT MARINE ESSENTIAL TO A NAVY.

No nation can maintain successfully for any length of time a navy unless there is behind it a merchant marine. Shipping is the element out of which a navy must grow. In the United States we are building a navy without having a merchant marine behind it to support it. This is something like making a head without a body. We should first have a merchant marine and then a navy, and native Americans to man both. We have not enough native American seamen to man the warships we now have. If we build up shipping and shipbuilding, it will increase our home commerce and our lake and coastwise trade. We are in the infancy of our industries on our lakes, rivers, and foreign seas. During the next century seagoing ships built in American shipyards will leave Chicago and other lake cities for the ports of the world.

No nation can be truly independent and have and maintain a navy and merchant marine that does not build its own ships.

PROTECTED SHIPOWNING WOULD STIMULATE SHIPBUILDING.

Whenever we protect carrying, and thereby gain business for American ships, building of ships will follow. This has been our experience in our coastwise, lake, and river trade, where we have built for a hundred years in our own shipyards the best ships for that business in the world. American carrying has not suffered in the foreign trade because of the inability to build good ships in the United States as much as it has from want of protection. For several years we have not been on an equal footing with other nations in the shipping business. While Great Britain and other European nations have free ships, yet for a long time they have protected shipbuilding by bounties and otherwise. It may be safely said that all the maritime powers of the world protect their shipping and shipbuilding. The spending in British shipyards of $100,000,000 annually for home and foreign warship construction is of itself equivalent to an enormous bounty to British shipbuilders. Give the people of the United States business for their ships and there will be no doubt about shipbuilding and shipowning being successful in the United States.

FAILURE OF THE FREE-SHIP POLICY.

After full and fair trial the free-ship policy has been a signal failure in France, Germany, Austria, and Italy. Norway has increased her shipping under free ships. This is due to the fact of low wages and low prices of supplies and other conditions peculiar to that country. England, after building up her shipping through discriminating duties and subsidies on an enormous scale, until she has the advantage over all other nations, adopts the policy of free ships because it is to her interest. She advocates free ships because she builds ships for the nations that buy them, and naturally she wants all other nations, the United States especially, to adopt free ships. In 1894 the new tonnage built in her shipyards amounted to over 1,000,000 tons, 13 per cent of which was sold to other countries.

INCREASE OF BRITISH SHIPPING UNDER MARITIME RECIPROCITY.

Under maritime reciprocity in 50 years, according to Mulhall, British shipping has increased 210 per cent, while that of other nations has increased 108 per cent, and that of the United States constantly declined. During this period British shipping has increased from carrying 34 per cent of the world's commerce to carrying 56 per cent of it. If this rate of increase continues, it is only a question of time when Great Britain will absorb the carrying of the commerce of the world.

Apart from shipping being the means of extending foreign trade in other countries, it is profitable from the standpoint of transportation. Our people should make the profits that come from the transportation in ships and are paid to other nations. If the people of the United States could make the earnings from carrying what they buy and sell, instead of paying nearly $200,000,000 annually to other nations, the result would be a saving of this amount. In 1895 there were 329,558 arrivals and 401,822 departures to and from the ports of the United States, a total of 731,380 passengers, nine-tenths, or about 650,000, of whom were carried in foreign vessels, at an average of $50 per head, or $32,500,000 made by foreign shipowners out of business which belongs to Americans.

ADVANTAGES TO THE WHOLE COUNTRY OF BUILDING UP AMERICAN SHIPPING.

It is generally supposed that shipping only concerns our Atlantic and Pacific Coast States, but this is unfounded. No industry affects the country more widely and generally than shipping. The farmers, as well as the producers of coal, lumber, iron, steel, lead, copper, and zinc, and most all other products, are interested in building up the shipping and shipyards of the country. Ninety per cent of the farm products which are exported are carried in foreign bottoms. If these products could be transported in vessels of the United States, it would stimulate and help all branches of business at home.

PASSING THIS BILL WOULD GIVE BUSINESS TO AMERICAN SHIPS.

The passage of this bill would provide business for our ships which they do not now have and can not get under present conditions. Under the provision that this act will not take effect for 15 months after its passage, ships can be built and gotten ready for the new business that will come to them. The objection is made, however, that we have not enough ships to do this increased business and that we can not build them as cheaply as other countries, and therefore could not compete with the cheaper made foreign ships, even with discriminating duties in our favor.

Taking into consideration the cheapness of construction of shipping on our lakes and in our coastwise trade, and the reduced cost of iron, steel, lumber, and other materials which enter into shipbuilding, it may be safely claimed that with a large and regular business in shipbuilding the United States can build the ordinary freight vessel as cheaply as England and very soon the great ocean steamer. Bearing on this point President Cleveland, in his last annual message, said:

"It is gratifying to state that our [war] ships and their outfits are believed to be equal to the best that can be manufactured elsewhere, and that such notable reductions have been made in their cost as to justify the statement that quite a number of vessels are now being constructed at rates as low as those that prevail in European shipyards."

This sustains my contention. We have rigidly excluded foreign shipbuilders from competing or taking part in building our warships. The result has been that home competition has grown up under which, because of the demand of the Government, our people have equipped vast shipbuilding plants, one of them at least equal to any abroad; and we now build warships as good and as cheaply as any country. With a like demand, ocean steamers should be built in the United States as cheaply as in any place in the world.

The policy of discriminating duties would contribute to both building and running ships. Under present conditions capital will not invest in American shipowning because it can have no assurance that after ships are built they can get business.

We import annually from South and Central American countries, Mexico, and the West Indies about one hundred and ninety-five millions of products. These are comparatively nonshipowning countries; we export to them ninety-one millions of products. If American ships should carry the imports from these countries to the United States, they could compete and take from foreign bottoms the return cargoes, or the carrying of ninety-one millions of exports.

Here is the carrying of nearly three hundred millions of products, 90 per cent of which is now done in foreign ships, which, if this bill becomes a law without retaliation or opposition of any kind, will come to our ships, and they can not get it any other way.

If I am right in assuming that the carrying of our imports in our own ships must follow the adoption of discriminating duties, it would give to American bottoms nearly $100,000,000 annually without the cost of one dollar to the people of the Government. No opposition can prevent this result. Under discriminating duties as provided in this bill, without cost of any kind, ocean carrying would seek American ships.

This view is indorsed and well expressed in the following extract from an able editorial by Alex. R. Smith in the journal, Seaboard, of New York, devoted to the cause of American shipping:

"There is no single act outside of a thoroughly protective tariff that would do so much to restore prosperity to the United States in all parts of the country as the passage of the discriminating duty bill."

If American ships could have the carrying of our imports, which would give them regularly the incoming cargo to the United States, this would put them in a position to compete with foreign ships for outgoing cargo, especially tramp ships coming to our ports in ballast. It is estimated that more than 5,000 foreign vessels came to our ports in 1894 in ballast in search of cargoes. It may be said that other shipowning countries, especially Great Britain, would retaliate and not allow American vessels to haul their imports. In case of retaliation we might transport in American ships only a small share of our exports to shipowning countries, but we would be in the position to take the business of carrying exports from the United States to countries not owning ships; we would gain this in addition to carrying our imports in our own ships. It is believed that among the good results that will follow the passage of this bill, one will be, and not the least, it will hasten the creation of a department of commerce, so much needed and so ably championed by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce.

("When the day comes that shipping again pays, when the three sea frontiers find that they are not only militarily weak, but poorer for lack of national shipping, their united efforts may avail to lay again the foundations of our sea power. Till then those who follow the limitations which lack of sea power placed upon the career of France may mourn that their own country is being led by a like redundency of home wealth into the same neglect of that great instrument. * * * Though the treatment of the subject has been somewhat discursive, it may be admitted that a great population following callings related to the sea is, now as formerly, a great element of sea power; that the United States is deficient in that element, and that its foundations can be laid in a large commerce under her own flag." Capt. Mahan, in The The Influence of Sea Power Upon History, 1898.)

THE EFFECT ON SHIPBUILDING AND OTHER INDUSTRIES.

Prince Bismarck said:

"The merchant service is the handmaid of all other industries, and of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. On the day when the freight trade is given over to foreigners a mortal blow will be dealt to all the industries of the country."

This is true. While the progress of the United States in building up its industries on land has excited the wonder of the world, yet greater and more substantial progress would have been made had we been able to develop and build up with equal pace our industries on the sea. What we have accomplished in our material progress has been without the aid of one of the most important auxiliaries to our prosperity. Thomas Jefferson said that "agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation are the four pillars of prosperity." In order that our material development should be symmetrical, all of these should go hand in hand; but we have moved forward with one of these great interests neglected for 70 years, until now it is in a languishing condition and not helpful to the other branches of industry.

If, by the passage of this bill, we take from foreign shipowners the carrying of our imports, we will have gone a great way in the struggle to restore our shipping.

CAUSES OF THE DECLINE OF AMERICAN CARRYING.

It is needless to discuss the causes of the decline of American carrying further than to endeavor to learn from them, if possible, what may be done to help revive and restore it. Among the causes that have contributed to this decline may be mentioned:

First. The abandonment of the policy of protection to American shipping by discriminating duties under treaties with foreign nations and giving instead of this protection no aid or encouragement whatever.

Second. Competition of American shipping, without aid of any kind, with foreign shipping, highly protected, aided and subsidized.

Third. In the absence of any protection or aid to American shipping it has had to pay heavy taxes at home, higher rates of interest, and higher wages than foreign shipping with which it competes.

Fourth. The hostile discrimination of British Lloyds Register in inspecting, rating, and classifying American ships, obliging them to pay the highest rate of insurance on cargoes and take the lowest rate of freight and wait the longest in various parts of the world for charters. Added to this the war of English insurance companies in the United States against insuring cargoes carried in American-built ships.

Mr. President, I have tried in what I have said to present the cause of American shipping to the Senate and to the country, with the earnest wish that Congress will do something looking to its restoration.

American ocean carrying, so long neglected, is not the cause of any party nor of any particular interest; it belongs to no section; it concerns the whole country, its future prosperity, and welfare; it has become the cause of 70,000,000 of people; henceforth they will take care of it; in their keeping it will no longer languish; it will not die, but prosper and grow and bless the country as in days gone by.

("For the encouragement of American steamships other than those operating under the ocean mail service act, for the encouragement of American sailing vessels, and for the extension of our export trade we have recommended a return to the early American policy of discriminating import duties and tonnage dues, through an amendment of section 22 of the existing tariff act. The section in question still carries upon our statute books a remnant of the provisions of the act of 1789, by which the discriminatory policy was then applied to our maritime development. That it has not entirely disappeared from our statutes shows the tenacity with which American statesmen have adhered to the shadow of a law the substance of which, in the full tide of its original application, accomplished so much for the upbuilding and maintenance of our shipping in the foreign trade." Extract from report submitted to the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York.)

("The interest of the whole community, not only those who are carriers, but those also who furnish the object of carriage, positively demands a domestic marine equal to its whole business; and that, even if it is to exist under rates higher than those of foreign navigation, it is to be preferred." Mr. Nichols, of Virginia, in Congress, 1794.)

PERSISTENT ADVOCACY OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

While attempt after attempt and bill after bill was pressed upon the attention of Congress in favor of subsidies and bounties, most of which measures passed the Senate, these bills received scant consideration at the hands of the House, and, once they were referred to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, rarely ever again saw the light of day. It was found that the Democratic minority Members could not be persuaded ever to give any encouragement to this class of legislation, and their remarks were generally directed, on the contrary, to an advocacy of discriminating duties.

DEMOCRATIC ADVOCACY OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

On February 1, 1904, the Democratic members of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee united in their opposition to a then pending subsidy and bounty bill, and presented a minority report, in which they advocated a return to the early policy of discriminating duties instead, as follows:

OUR PLAN OF RELIEF.

The merchant marine of this Nation in its early history was built up as if by magic by the policy of discriminating duties and tonnage taxes.

It is the only system which has proved successful.

All others now proposed are at best mere experiments—guesswork.

We see no insuperable obstacles in the way of its present successful adoption.

The navigation interests of the United States languished before the Constiution was adopted, and one of the principal, if not the most potent, factor in bringing about its adoption was the urgent demand for uniform regulations of commerce in favor of our home marine.

In 1789 we were carrying 17 per cent of our imports and 30 per cent of our exports. One of the first acts of the First Congress was to establish a tonnage tax of 6 cents on home vessels and 50 cents on foreign vessels entering our ports, and a rebate of 10 per cent of tariff duties on goods imported in American vessels.

WHAT DISCRIMINATING DUTIES ONCE DID.

Without going into further details of measures passed, the result of this system was that our marine advanced by leaps and bounds, so that in 1794 we carried 91 per cent of our imports and 86 per cent exports in American bottoms. This flattering condition continued in unabated vigor, except temporarily during the war of 1812, until high watermark was reached in 1825, when we carried over 95 per cent of our imports and 89 per cent of our exports.

DEVITALIZED LAW STILL RETAINED.

On the statute books of the United States the discriminating-duty system still stands in apparent force, but its vitality has been wiped out by a system of trade conventions with foreign nations by which their vessels are placed on a level with ours in the ports of the United States.

Not to burden this report with details, it may be fairly said these treaties began to take full effect about 1828, and from that time until now our carrying trade has steadily declined. We lost about 1 per cent a year for 30 years until the Civil War. It revived slightly after the war, but again drooped and dwindled, and under this system we now carry about 9 per cent of our traffic.

Many volumes have been written about these things, torrents of debate have poured forth, and many are the theories presented for our consideration, but the "short and simple annals" of our foreign-carrying trade are contained in the foregoing. Theory may be piled on theory, but the simple fact is, experience proves that a moderate discriminating duty will accomplish what we all want—and no nation can justly take offense.

A NONPARTISAN NATIONAL POLICY.

The policy of discriminating duties was inaugurated by the fathers of the Democratic Party, and it has recently had the official sanction of the Republican Party, and it may therefore be justly termed nonpartisan and broadly American. Jefferson and Madison were the authors of our earliest laws along these lines. Adam Smith, the greatest apostle of free trade, declared that protective navigation laws were the one justifiable exception in his proposed system.

The Republican national platform of 1896 said:

"We favor restoring the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in the foreign trade * * * so that American ships may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce."

Mr. McKinley, in his letter of acceptance, said:

"The policy of discriminating duties which prevailed in the early years of our history should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas are fully attained."

"Of the several suggestions looking to remedial legislation, we advocate the modified duty on imports carried in American bottoms, believing with our able Senator MARTIN that this, rather than direct subsidy will receive favorable action by Congress." Statement by E. T. D. Myers, jr., of Richmond, Va., representing the Richmond Chamber of Commerce before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904).)

REPUBLICANS ADVOCATE IT.

In 1894 Senator Frye proposed in the Senate to abrogate the trade conventions and again inaugurate the discriminating-duty plan of building up our marine, and was supported by Senator LODGE, Senator Higgins, and other Republican Senators. In 1907 Senator Elkins delivered an able speech in the Senate advocating this policy.

No one questions the certainty and effectiveness of the discriminating duty plan if it should be adopted. While the Democratic plan is opposed to taxing the general industries of the country in order to give the proceeds to a private enterprise, it is not opposed to encouraging the American marine by a reduction of taxation.

The principal argument offered by its opponents is that we must first abrogate over 20 trade conventions with foreign nations, and that these nations would retaliate against our shipping in their ports and against our exports, especially foodstuffs.

TREATIES PROVIDE FOR THEIR TERMINATION.

These conventions all contain provisos that they may be annulled on one year's notice (some of them six months' notice) by either party, and 14 have been so annulled at different times. There is no practical difficulty whatever in the way of annulling them if we so decide. Senator Frye's proposed bill and Senator Elkins's proposed bill for discriminating duties simply fixed the 10 per cent discriminating duty in favor of American vessels, and then provided that the same should take effect in 15 months, and in the meantime notice of the act should be given to the foreign nations.

RETALIATION CAN NOT HURT US.

With reference to retaliation, it may be said we have no foreign shipping now to speak of, hence they can not hurt us in that direction, while we could soon get back at least 50 per cent of our foreign carrying.

But, the advocates of the subsidy say, foreign nations will retaliate by increased duties against our products. We can not believe that their expressed fears are genuine. To bring about retaliation from a sensible people you must do some harmful, unjust act; you must grab for more than your share. But to adopt a moderate policy of encouragement of our merchant marine in order to get our just share of trade will not provoke a sane man. If we were seeking what rightfully belonged to them, we might expect revengeful measures, but to ask a part of what is ours by all moral standards may call forth their selfish efforts to prevent us from adopting the measures, but not retaliation for purposes of revenge.

The men who see danger of retaliation in discriminating duties are the men who want subsidies. If foreigners were going to retaliate against our foodstuffs, every provocation has been furnished by the Dingley bill. The nation that would stand our almost prohibitive tariffs without retaliation is not going to take offense or umbrage if we adopt conservative measures simply to get a part of our own without the remotest thought of taking anything that belongs to them.

("Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in advising the adoption of the method of preferential duties for American shipping we are asking for no new policy, but merely for the Government to extend to this tottering industry partially what it has given every other so liberally. I believe in the method of discriminating duties and tonnage taxes because it creates a preference for American bottoms in the mind of the importer and shipper, and thereby insures continual employment for the vessel. It makes competition between two merchants for the American vessel instead of competition between two vessels for the same freight * * *" Extract from statement before the Merchant Marine Commission, 1904, by Fields S. Pendleton, president Atlantic Carriers' Association, in which 400,000 tons of American sail vessels were represented.)

("By imposing discriminating duties on imports brought to our ports in foreign bottoms from countries other than those under the flag of which the ship sails the American shipowners will soon monopolize the carrying trade between the United States and countries that have no merchant marine. Supplementing this provision, a tonnage tax and reasonable compensation for carrying mails on routes that can not be established through discriminating duties alone would attract capital and men to the ocean-carrying trade, and thus build up the American merchant marine. For details of this plan, which has been advocated by the Milwaukee Sentinel for many months, reference is made to the early navigation laws of this country, enacted by the first American Congress and continued for nearly 40 years, and to that excellent report of the special committee of the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, already mentioned." Statement of E. T. Wheelock, editor Milwaukee Sentinel, made before the Merchant Marine Commission, 1904.)

RENEWED DEMOCRATIC ADVOCACY OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Congress provided for the appointment of what was known as the Merchant Marine Commission, in 1904, which conducted investigations in many seaports and Lake ports and Gulf ports, in order to ascertain the views of citizens who were interested as to the best method by which to build up an American marine in foreign trade. The majority of this commission favored a subsidy and bounty bill, which no Democrat could be induced to support. On the contrary, they joined in a report in opposition, giving their reasons in detail as to why they opposed the bill favored by the majority members. As to the policy they advocated by which to build up our shipping, that of discriminating duties, their report contains the following:

REPORT OF SENATOR S. B. MALLORY AND REPRESENTATIVES THOMAS SPIGHT AND ALLAN L. MCDERMOTT, MINORITY MEMBERS OF THE MERCHANT MARINE COMMISSION.

JANUARY 9, 1905.

It is agreed by every observant man who has given thought to the subject that our shipping interests in the foreign trade are in a deplorable condition. That something ought to be done to restore to American bottoms a reasonable percentage of our export and import carrying trade is conceded by all; the only difference of opinion is as to what the remedy should be.

NATION-WIDE DEMAND FOR DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

A return to the discriminating-duty policy appears to be generally favored, as shown by the hearings of the Merchant Marine Commission at the most important ports on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts and on the Great Lakes. This was the policy of the fathers of the Republic, under which our shipping interests were so marvelously developed in our early history. Under this policy merchant ships flying the American flag were seen in every important port of the civilized world, and under its fostering care our ships carried more than three-fourths of our exports and imports. Although our business has increased so wonderfully that we are now the largest exporting Nation in the world, with corresponding imports, only 8 or 10 per cent of our foreign carrying trade is done in American bottoms.

TREATIES ALL TERMINABLE—FEAR OF RETALIATION UNFOUNDED.

The objections urged to a return to this system are based upon the necessity of abrogating treaties with nearly all the maritime countries and the fear of retaliation. That those treaties all operate to the great disadvantage of the United States under present conditions is not seriously denied in any quarter. They all provide, too, for abrogation at the instance of either party to the convention upon the prescribed notice, so that no element of bad faith could be charged if steps should be taken to abrogate. In the light of our earlier experiences and in view of the peculiar existing conditions, we think the fear of retaliation is not well founded. In our infancy as a Nation we not only faced this danger courageously, but successfully, and our shipping industry prospered far beyond anything we have witnessed since we bound ourselves by treaties to virtually surrender our business on the high seas. At present the larger part of our exports are food and clothing products, either in the raw or finished state, and the countries which are our best customers can not afford to discriminate against our goods, because this would only tend to increase the cost of necessaries to their own people.

DISCRIMINATE ON FREE AND DUTIABLE IMPORTS.

The strongest argument presented against this policy is the fact that about 40 per cent of our imports are of goods which are now on the "free list," and that the only way to enforce discrimination in respect to such imports would be to increase the "dutiable list." Of course, we do not advocate an increased cost of imported goods to the American consumer, but with the treaties out of the way we might meet this difficulty by imposing a low rate of duty on many of the imports when brought in foreign bottoms, but still to be free from tariff when brought in our own ships, and thus enable American vessels to compete successfully with foreign ships in freight charges and at the same time minimize the danger of increased cost to the consumer. What we want to do is to give some assurance to our foreign-going ships that they will have return cargoes, which would go far toward settling the question of the carrying of our exports in our own bottoms. But we are not willing, nor do we think it necessary, to commit ourselves to the proposition that anything now upon the "free list" should be made "dutiable." We prefer to take the chances of aiding our merchant marine by discriminating duties upon the 60 per cent of imports now on the "dutiable list."

This, we believe, would result in permanent assistance to our languishing shipping interests without imposing any additional burdens upon the public. We wish to aid our merchant marine by reducing burdens, not increasing them. * * *

("In the opinion of your committee it might be possible and desirable to adopt both methods; discriminating duties and other regulations and premiums on exports where there is already a large commerce, as between our ports and those of Europe, and subsidies or liberal mail pay where the traffic is small but offering prospects of growth, as between our ports and those of South America and the Orient." Extract from report made to the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by the Associated Board of Trade of Boston.)

SENATOR MALLORY'S ADVOCACY OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

One of the most distinguished Southern Senators of his time was Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, an eminent and learned lawyer, one thoroughly versed in "admirality" law, or that relating to shipping and the seas. It was because of his thorough knowledge of the subject, the early history of American shipping, its rise and decline, that he was selected as one of the minority members of the Merchant Marine Commission. He very strongly opposed the bill favored by the majority members of that commisison, and in the speech in which he traversed the bill he concluded his remarks with a statement of what he would do to build up our merchant marine if he alone were clothed with power to that end. Although he advocated the discriminating-duty policy in the way of a reduction of the duty, attention is invited to the fact that he was quite ready, and, indeed, regarded it as a patriotic duty which he was sure the people would indorse, to advocate a slight duty on goods on the free list if brought in foreign vessels. On the subject of discriminating duties Senator Mallory said:

SPEECH OF SENATOR STEPHEN R. MALLORY, OF FLORIDA, JANUARY 18, 1906.

[See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1289–1301.]

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I do not intend to consume any more of the time of the Senate in this desultory talk, but before leaving the subject I think it is proper I should express my views, or at least give some intimation of what I would do were I to be permitted to frame a bill for the purpose of rebuilding our merchant marine.

DIRECT DISCRIMINATION FAVORED.

I am free to say that I have given the subject some thought, and I am very much inclined to favor the scheme that was generally outlined by the bill introduced by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] about 18 months ago in this body, a bill for the promotion of our merchant marine by a system of discriminating duties. I, however, do not think that a system of indirect discrimination will avail. I am decidedly in favor of direct discrimination, and I think that the opportunity is presented to the country to-day to avail itself of its tariff to build up the grandest merchant marine the world has ever seen, and to do it at a comparatively slight cost.

FEAR OF TREATY ABROGATION ONLY A BUGABOO.

It is true that we have the bugaboo presented to us, whenever the question is broached, that we have a number of treaties which constrain us and which would become ineffective upon our taking this action. All those treaties are in a certain sense mercantile conventions, not in the broad sense treaties. They contemplated, when they were originally instituted, that they could be set aside on a year's notice, and many of them have been set aside from time to time by other nations. I do not remember now exactly how many there are, but when I last figured it out I think there were only 23 of those so-called treaties which stood in the way. Many of them are simply clauses in treaties, providing that reciprocity in our intercourse with each other in shipping matters shall be observed for a certain period of time, at the expiration of which time the agreement can be set aside after a year's notice, or will be set aside with no action unless the other side should take some affirmative action in the matter.

Now, to hurry on, Mr. President, the treaty trouble has had no terrors for me. It has had for the commission. There seems to be a notion, not merely confined to the commission, but among a great many people in this country, that if we should undertake to set aside those treaties we might meet with very bitter retaliation, the results of which no man could predict.

THE RETALIATION SCARE.

Mr. President, we have given the nations of the world all the excuse in the world to retaliate on us. We have the highest protective tariff in the world. We have shut out everything by a wall that prevents foreign nations from sending their goods to this country, and we have no good will at all among the nations. Whenever they can retaliate on us they are going to do it, and we must not be restrained by the idea that if we do something particularly offensive they are going to retaliate. They will retaliate on us whenever they can do so effectively and put themselves in a better position than they now occupy.

I have not time to dilate on that point, but I believe it can be demonstrated that we have no real reason to apprehend any calamity to this country, any injury to our trade or commerce, by reason of the abrogation of every one of the treaties now in existence on the subject of reciprocity in shipping.

I have taken the trouble to figure out a little here as to what would be the result in the event Congress agreed to abolish these treaties and to establish a direct discrimination as between us and the nations of the world in the goods carried by American ships and the goods brought to this country by foreign ships.

We are told also, with a considerable air of menace, that the countries of the world that we wish to build up trade with, the South American countries particularly, with which we have a very limited trade, when, in fact, we should have a large trade, are countries whose products come to this country largely on the free list, and in order to avail ourselves of a discriminating duty there we would have to put those articles on the dutiable list.

("But from what I have observed and from the testimony you have taken, and the consensus of opinion as far as this investigation has gone, I am inclined to lean toward discriminating duties." Statement of James W. Porch, merchant, at New Orleans, before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904).)

THE PEOPLE WOULD APPROVE.

I have sufficient confidence, Mr. President, in the people of the United States to have no hesitation whatever in believing that they would sustain me in voting to put many of those articles which are now on the free list on the dutiable list if the object to be accomplished is the building up of the merchant marine. It is a patriotic object. It is one which every man who has the welfare and good name and honor and glory of his country at heart will approve, and I have no hesitation at all in committing myself to the principle that if it is necessary, or if it will result in building up the merchant marine for the United States, it is my duty to put on the dutiable list such articles now on the free list as will be necessary to effect that purpose.

HOW THE POLICY WOULD OPERATE.

Now, I take the item of coffee from Brazil. We import all that coffee free. The importations amount to 445,489 long tons. At one-tenth cent per pound that would amount to $997,896, which would give the shipmasters an opportunity to get a cargo in Rio Janeiro or in all the ports of Brazil at a rate of $2.24 per ton less freight than a foreign competitor. In other words, an American ship, with one-tenth cent per pound on coffee, would have an advantage over the foreigner on a cargo from Rio Janeiro to the United States of $2,240 per 1,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the Senator means, then, to impose a duty on coffee in that case?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes; one-tenth of a cent. I would be willing to vote for it if by so doing I could effectually contribute to building up the merchant marine.

With sugar it is the same. On sugar we pay a duty. We have an average duty on sugar of 1.5 cents per pound, a pretty heavy duty. We import 1,763,338 long tons. At a reduction of one-tenth of a cent we would have a reduction of $3,949,878, which would allow the same difference exactly at one-tenth of a cent on the 1,000 tons that there is in the case of coffee; that is, an American vessel would be $2,240 better off with a cargo of a thousand tons than a foreign vessel, so far as the ports of the United States are concerned.

Now, take india rubber and gutta-percha unmanufactured. We have 42,238 long tons, valued at $42,214,135. The duty at 2 cents a pound would amount to $1,892,277, which would be divided among American shipowners.

Hides. A large proportion of the hides that come to this country from South America, 188,564,013 pounds, come in free; 83,652,950 pounds come in under 15 per cent duty. The duty on the dutiable hides is $1,621,827. Two per cent duty on the hides now free would be $820,571, a reduction of one-third, or 5 per cent duty on the dutiable, $540,609, making a saving to the American of $1,361,180 on 121,704 long tons.

HOW TO GET OUR SOUTH AMERICAN CARRYING.

Now, there are four items—two of them are dutiable and two of them are free. The total tonnage of those articles would be 2,372,769, and the total difference between the established and the discriminating duties would be $8,201,231. I merely cite those as an illustration to show how a direct discriminating duty would work. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that under a wise system of tonnage taxes we would have no difficulty whatever in providing a return cargo. We would have a cargo from Argentina, Brazil, or Central America, and when it gets to the port of the United States for which it is destined the duty imposed on tonnage, which has in the past been imposed, would act as a check on foreign competition for outward cargoes. The American merchant marine under such a stimulus would increase and flourish as it did when it led the world, and I doubt very much if more than 10 years would elapse before we would have our merchant marine again in the gratifying position it occupied in 1860.

("I am strongly in favor of a reduction of import duties on all cargo imported in American-built vessels. * * * It gives the American ship in foreign ports the preference of freights to the extent of the reduction of the duty, and our American manufacturers and producers are not injured in any way by such reduction in duties. * * * I believe foreign vessels employed in trades between the United States ports and foreign ports other than between the United States and their home ports should be charged an increased tariff on all their imports and additional port charges." Statement of James Rolph, jr. (1904), president of the Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast, before the Merchant Marine Commission at San Francisco.)

("The method of levying discriminating duties advocated by Senator Elkins and others appeals to me as being one of the best means of 'remedying the disabilities which now exist' and superior to many schemes heretofore proposed, as it seems to meet some of the objections urged against other methods." Statement before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by Charles H. Cramp, shipbuilder, at Philadelphia.)

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES GROWING IN POPULAR FAVOR.

In the years succeeding Senator Mallory's speech the subject of American shipping rehabilitation was kept constantly before the people and was the subject of wide discussion and many measures in Congress, which have so far resulted in nothing of a tangible and effective nature. But there is one thing that is of marked significance, and that is, among both Democrats and Republicans, and in the press of the country, there is a steady growth of sentiment more and more pronounced in favor of the early American policy of discriminating duties as the most effective means by which to restore our marine to the seas. It accomplished so much in the many years it was in full or in partial force, it operated so unobjectionably, it cost the people nothing, it took no money from the National Treasury; on the contrary, it had the good effect of adding money to the Treasury, and at the same time helping American shipping. These are reasons, the more they are studied, that are sure to still further popularize this policy.

("I am frank to say that my own idea, if it could be done, is that it would be a great deal more effective and permanent if done in the way of discriminating duties than by a direct subsidy, a most offensive manner to the large number of the people of this country." Statement made to Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by Capt. David Vance, shipowner, at Milwaukee.)

("But why not go back to the old and well-tried American policy of giving a discriminating duty to American ships bringing goods from foreign countries to the United States? * * * We know there was a time when American sails whitened every ocean on the globe, and it was the day in which the American ship brought in goods, I think, for 10 per cent less than the foreigner." Statement made to the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by I. B. Cohen, of Portland, Oreg.)

REPRESENTATIVE UNDERWOOD ADVOCATES DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

The latest and by far the most distinguished living man in public life who has formally placed himself on record in favor of discriminating duties is OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, now chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, the Democratic leader on the floor of the House, and one of the most influential and beloved men in his party. In a speech on a shipping bill that provided subsidies and bounties, in 1910—only three years ago—and which he opposed, Mr. UNDERWOOD declared himself in favor of discriminating duties in a speech that shows a thorough study of the subject and a profound belief in the superior efficacy of this policy, and in which he said:

SPEECH OF REPRESENTATIVE OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, OF ALABAMA, FEBRUARY 26, 1910.

[See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 2475 to 2480.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, "We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury."

Thus spoke the representatives of the Democratic voters of the United States in the convention at Denver, Colo., in 1908, when they gave to the country as the exponent of their faith the national Democratic platform.

WILL DEMOCRATS REDEEM THEIR PLEDGE.

Shall the Representatives in Congress holding allegiance to the Democratic Party keep the faith and redeem the pledge? If so, how can the upbuilding of the American merchant marine be accomplished without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury? Let us follow in the footsteps of the fathers of our party and we will find the way.

OUR PRESENT CONSTITUTION GREW OUT OF SHIPPING NEEDS.

A convention called at Annapolis shortly after the close of the Revolutionary War for the purpose of devising ways and means by which the Colonies could protect the commerce and shipping interests of the newborn Republic was the first move toward the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and from this convention ultimately sprung the Constitutional Convention that gave to our country the greatest written Constitution ever conceived by man for the organization of free governments, so that it can be justly said that the encouragement of American shipping and American commerce was one of the foundation stones of our Republic.

IMPORTANCE OF SHIPPING.

No question outranked in importance the fostering care of our commerce in the first Congresses of the United States. The building of American ships and the development of our foreign commerce for years has been discussed from many and varied standpoints. When we consider the building up of the American merchant marine we naturally ask the question, Is it worth while, and if it is worth while, what are the benefits to be obtained? Almost before the dawn of civilization nations were fighting for trade, and it has always been recognized that a favorable balance of trade was a vital factor in the commercial life of nations to be contended for by all. A country may maintain the balance of commerce in its favor by its export of commodities produced at home, either agricultural or manufacturing; or it may maintain a balance in its favor by reason of the work done by it for other nations. England, Norway, Germany, and France are great carriers of commerce for others than themselves. They annually have an adverse balance of trade against them amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, but as great as this adverse balance of trade is, they easily pay it by carrying in their ships the products of other nations. Without their earnings from their ships they could not for any length of time continue their present excessive importation of commodities from other lands.

BALANCE OF TRADE AND BALANCE OF COMMERCE.

Transportation must be balanced as well as trade, either by trade, by transportation, or by the exchange of precious metals, securities, or investments. It has been recognized universally that a country that settles its balance of commerce in gold must ultimately become a decadent nation, poorer and poorer as the years go by.

Our early statesmen, recognizing this fact, contended for fair commerce between the Colonies and foreign nations. Benjamin Franklin stated:

"Fair commerce is where equal values are exchanged for equal, the expenses of transportation included. Thus, if it cost A in England as much labor and charge to raise a bushel of wheat as it cost B in France to produce 4 gallons of wine, then are 4 gallons of wine the fair exchange for a bushel of wheat, A and B meeting at half distance with their commodities to make the exchange. The advantage of this commerce is that each party increases the number of his enjoyments, having instead of wheat alone and wine alone the use of both wheat and wine."

The balance of commerce in its trade relations with other countries is largely the determining factor in the life of a nation, that ascertains whether it shall be rich or poor, weak or strong, dependent or independent. Shipless trading nations are constantly in foreign debt and often in financial straits.

The preponderance of exports over imports may fix the balance of trade in a nation's favor; nevertheless, if some other nation is carrying its commerce, the cost of transportation being paid to the foreigner, the balance of commerce often is left in favor of the foreign nation and must be paid in gold or its equivalent. Let us not forget that commerce consists of transportation as well as trade. The freight charge becomes a part of the value of the cargo, whether it is credited to the side of the imports or the exports depends on whether the ship is foreign or domestic. Our own ships carrying goods abroad increases our credit there; our own ships bringing goods home save in debt here. It is of equal importance that the charge for transportation should be equally balanced as that the trade balance should be in our favor. Where two countries do an equal amount of the carrying trade between them, a balancing of the imports and exports may show the debtor and creditor side of their trade condition, but where one is doing a preponderance of the transportation, that must be taken into the reckoning before a true balance of the account can be ascertained.

This is illustrated from the history of our own commercial transactions. The first favorable balance of commerce, of 66 cents per capita, occurred in 1793, four years after the inauguration of the Government. Our trade balances, as shown by the imports and exports, were adverse to the extent of $1.18 per capita, but transportation being in our favor to the extent of $1.84 per capita, left us on the credit side of the national ledger. The first favorable balance of trade—that is, of imports and exports—did not happen until 1811, and was largely induced by conditions growing out of the threatened war with England; but up to that time the balance of commerce had been largely in our favor, due to the earnings of our ships in the carrying trade. The greatest excess of transportation per capita that our country has ever experienced was in 1807, when it amounted to $6.90 per capita. That year our exports were $16.25 per capita and our imports $20.78 per capita, which left a balance of trade against us, but our earnings on the sea converted an adverse balance of trade to a favorable balance of commerce to the extent of $2.37 per capita. For the first half century of our Government our shipping interest by its earnings secured for us a balance of commerce in our favor, but after the decline of the American shipping interest had once begun we have had a balance of commerce against us, with very rare exceptions, notwithstanding the fact that in many years the balance of trade has been favorable, by reason of the exports being in excess of our imports.

ADVERSE BALANCES OF COMMERCE.

From 1862 to 1896 we had 25 favorable balances of trade, but 9 of these were converted to adverse balances after paying our transportation charges, reducing our favorable balances of commerce to 16, as against 28 for foreign benefit, in spite of ample exports and a high protective tariff that restricted importations as far as possible. These adverse balances were largely paid in bullion. I find in the statistics of the movement in gold and silver coin and bullion for 33 years prior to 1896 that there was a net export of precious metals to the amount of $1,366,755,000 toward the payment of our adverse balances, a dangerous condition for even the strongest and wealthiest of nations to continue in; and yet during all these years that the Republican Party has controlled the Government absolutely nothing has been done to correct the evil of shipping our basic money abroad to discharge adverse balances of transportation recurring from year to year caused by the absence of an adequate merchant marine.

("Ten years of especially low import duties on all imports brought into the United States in American bottoms, with the gradual withdrawal of this protection in the following 10 years, would establish both the American shipbuilding companies and the American owners on such a firm basis that, in my opinion, they could at the expiration of this 20-year period be in a position to take care of themselves on a profitable basis. * * * The 20 years' experience thus gained by our great shipyards will, in my opinion, enable us to build better and cheaper boats than any other nation in the world; so that in 1925 we shall not only be the richest and most progressive nation of the world but we shall be and will always remain the mistress of the seas." Statement before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by J. Scott Parrish, of Richmond, Va.)

JEFFERSON'S PROPHETIC UTTERANCE.

The importance of a merchant marine of our country was clearly expressed by Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State under George Washington in 1791, when he said that "the marketing of our products will be at the mercy of any nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and our politics may be influenced by those who command our commerce." This statement, made nearly 120 years ago, is prophetic of our present condition. Foreign Governments are almost exclusively possessed of our foreign carrying trade, and, to a large extent, the arrangement of their shipping routes has excluded our commerce from the markets of South America and will continue to do so as long as present conditions remain.

DENOUNCES REPUBLICAN NEGLECT.

Since the Civil War the Republican Party has had either absolute or partial control of the Government, except for two years during the first half of the second Cleveland administration. In this period of nearly 60 years nothing has been done toward building up our carrying trade or restoring it to the position it occupied in the first half century after the organization of the Government. In 1860 our carriage in American vessels of imports amounted to 60 per cent and of exports to 72 per cent, or an average of 66 per cent of American commerce carried in American ships; to-day the American commerce carried in American ships averages about 9 per cent. During the life of the Republican Party it has placed on the statute books what is known as the act of March 3, 1891, which provides for a mail-contract subsidy, providing bounties for certain ships carrying the mail of the United States. As our shipping has decreased to a very large extent since the passage of this act, this fact has demonstrated that the act was not an effective remedy for existing evils. It has also enacted into law a pretended discriminating tariff against foreign ships, which, under its terms, became inoperative at once. All the legislation it has ever passed has been ineffective and barren of results, so far as our merchant marine and foreign commerce is concerned.

EARLY SHIPPING LEGISLATION.

Many of the men who were members of the Constitutional Convention were Members of the first Congresses of the United States. These Congresses were greatly interested in the development and building up of our merchant marine and the control of our foreign trade. No men understood better the limitations of the powers of Congress than the men who served in the Senate and the House of Representatives in the early history of our Government, and it is interesting to note the policy they pursued and the course they followed to produce the desired results. The first bill enacted by the Congress after it assembled was the tariff act of July 4, 1789. Section 5 of that act reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that a discount of 10 per cent on all the duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels built in the United States and which shall be wholly the property of a citizen or citizens thereof, or in vessels built in foreign countries, and on the 16th day of May last wholly the property of a citizen of the United States, and so continuing until the time of importation."

From this it will be seen that a discriminating duty by way of discount of 10 per cent was given on all goods imported into the United States in American ships owned by American citizens. James Madison, the father of the Constitution of the United States, was in charge of the bill, and the logic and force of his great intellect was in favor of the adoption of the discriminating duty in favor of American ships.

A few years later the tariff act of August 10, 1790, was passed, and section 2 of this act read as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, that an addition of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise which after the said last day of December next shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, except in the cases in which an additional duty is hereinbefore especially laid on any goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in such ships or vessels."

From this law it will be seen that the discriminating duty was still continued in force, but was changed from a discount of 10 per cent on goods coming in American vessels to an additional duty of 10 per cent on goods imported in foreign vessels.

These discriminating tariff duties were again enacted in the act of June 7, 1794, and again in the tariff act of January 29, 1795, and again in the tariff act of May 11, 1800. The tariff act of March 12, 1804, section 3, reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, that an addition of 10 per cent shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified and imposed in respect to all such goods, wares, and merchandise as aforesaid as shall, after the said 30th day of June, be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States."

JEFFERSON APPROVED OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

It is worthy of note that this bill was passed in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, was signed by him when it became a law, and carried his approval of a discriminating duty of an additional 10 per cent levied on all goods imported into this country in foreign ships for the purpose of upbuilding the American merchant marine.

SUCCESSIVE DEMOCRATIC DISCRIMINATING-DUTY LAWS.

Practically the same law was reenacted in the tariff act of July 1, 1812, and again reenacted in the tariff act of February 25, 1813, when James Madison was President of the United States, and received his approval, as did the first discriminating duty passed by the First Congress. These discriminating duties in favor of the American ship and the upbuilding of our foreign commerce were advocated, proposed, and enacted into law by the founders of the Democratic Party. Our statesmen advocated the enactment of this legislation both as a matter of principle and as a good business and governmental policy. The wisdom of their laws was demonstrated by the results obtained. Such was the purpose and good effect of these acts of Congress that from 1789 to 1794, a period of seven years, the carrying of foreign imports in American ships rose from about 17 per cent to 94 per cent, and the exports of all American goods in American ships during that same period rose from about 30 per cent to 90 per cent, until the war of 1812, when it fell to an average of 55 per cent, but fully recovered in six years and culminated at an average of 92½ per cent in 1826.

POLICY SUSPENDED—NOT REPEALED.

At this time a suspension of the discriminating duties in favor of the American ships was recommended by the President, and in 1828 an act for this purpose was passed, which I will now read:

"That upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied in the ports of said nation upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported in the same from the United States or from any foreign country, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are and shall be suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said foreign nation and the produce, manufactures, and merchandise imported into the United States in the same from the said foreign nation or from any other country, the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States and their cargoes as aforesaid shall be continued, and no longer."

The new policy was admitted as experimental, but it was contended that if it should not work as expected and a loss of carrying trade should follow, then Congress could repeal the conventions made under its terms and reinstate the old system. The passage of the bill proved the undoing of the merchant marine, and the policy it inaugurated has never been changed.

FOREIGN NATIONS UNFAIR.

Shipping nations were not honest enough between themselves for the application of free-trade principles in navigation, and most of our rivals while professing to practice a policy of nondiscrimination against American ships, acted unfairly and resorted to some form of ship protection, either by granting subsidies or bounties or by adopting other methods of discrimination against American ships.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND EFFECTIVE WAY.

Great Britain did not avail itself of the benefits of the law of 1828 until 1850, and in 12 years thereafter we had lost 21 per cent of our carrying trade. This brought us up to the period of the Civil War, and shows conclusively that it was not war conditions alone that destroyed our merchant marine, but the change of policy on the part of our Government had commenced its destruction before the war period was reached. Under these circumstances it seems clear to me that the constitutional and effective way to restore the American ships to the seas and carry American commerce in American bottoms is to return to the policy of the fathers and for the Congress to adopt again a discriminating duty in favor of American ships.

ADVANTAGES OF REVIVING DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

A reduction of the tariff of 5 per cent on all goods imported into the United States in American ships would give the American shipowner an advantage over the foreign shipowner in payment of duties of from ten to fifteen millions of dollars annually. This would not fall as a burden on anyone; it, of course, would enable the American shipowner to charge nearly the amount of the discriminating duty as additional freight rates, but it would not increase the cost of goods imported in this country a dollar over what they are to-day. It would not take a dollar out of the Federal Treasury, and, in my judgment, it is the only effective remedy that can be adopted toward building up the merchant marine of our country, and keep the profits that are derived from the transportation of our foreign commerce at home instead of paying it to foreign nations. The only objection that I have heard urged to this policy has been that it would be in violation of our foreign treaties, and that we could not afford to endanger our trade relations with foreign countries in this way.

("One of these plans is no doubt preferable to the other, and I speak for, preferential duties; yet, if the subsidy plan should be decided upon by Congress as the best, I would say, 'Well done, good and faithful servants,' because the poorest legislation proposed in this case is a million times better than no legislation at all, and will be a step in the direction of progress." Extract from statement made to the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by A. C. Passano, president Great Lakes Engineering Works, at Detroit.)

TREATIES—CONVENTIONS—RETALIATION.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet that has been issued by William W. Bates, president of the Shipping Association of America, and at one time Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, then a bureau in the Treasury Department, but now in the Department of Commerce and Labor. There is no man in America better advised and informed on these questions than Mr. Bates, and I read you what he says as to how far conventions made under the act of 1828 are effective and control our actions to-day:

"It is supposed by some who are friends of our marine, and others who are not, that certain conventions, which some term treaties, and others think are commercial covenants, stand in the way of reviving our early policy of trade regulations. They take it that our early policy was abandoned, and that foreign nations have acquired the rights that we relinquished. These notions are mistaken. The 'conventions' were made for nothing else than the mutual suspension of ship protection, then generally secured by trade regulations. In making these agreements our early policy was not abandoned, only temporarily and conditionally 'suspended' (that is the word in the act) as to such nations as would reciprocate for a term of years—generally 10. With respect to other nations, our primal policy is in full force to-day. Only 22 nations are now excepted from our regulations as they stood in 1828. Several nations—such as Brazil, Peru, Nicaragua, and Venezuela—have terminated their conventions with us, without at all disturbing their trade relations. We had a commercial convention with England (1854–1864) for trade reciprocity with Canada, which we terminated in 1865 without injuring our trade relations in the least.

"We relinquished no rights whatever by granting a privilege for a term of years. On the contrary, it may be contended that our rights on the sea, and to the regulation of our trade, were confirmed by every nation that made a convention with us—for a privilege to bring to our ports ships and cargoes from their own and other countries free of discriminating duties.

"The conventions merely made exceptions to our permanent law. The right to terminate the conventions, after the expiration of the term fixed, was reserved by stipulation to each party, and the exercise of this right can not be questioned by either party, nor can other parties offer valid objections.

"However, there are some to whom these facts should be common knowledge, who ask whether the termination of our 'maritime reciprocity conventions' (not treaties) 'would not mean the tearing up of our trade relations with the rest of the world?' The answer is, most decidedly, 'No!' Trade relations are not at all concerned. Our trade relations were established with foreign nations long before any of these 'conventions' were made. They are like a coverlet to a bed—that may be left on or laid off.

"We have a just case of action against these conventions. Under them, and owing to them, our foreign carrying trade has been lost. Other nations have gained it from us. Doubtless they believe in them, because our hands are tied from using against them the only protection possible under our Constitution; but why any American feels like longer tolerating them seems strange indeed. With the conventions terminated the argument for the safety of trade relations would vanish, since it has no more weight than a summer cloud.

"Besides, in point of fact, our rivals have paid no attention to the spirit and true object of these conventions—the doing without ship protection. On the contrary, all of them have resorted to protective devices of some sort. Devices such as some substitute for trade regulations are impossible of application in the United States. The truth is that our foreign carrying trade needs more protection than that of any foreign nation, and Congress must be perfectly free to make it into law; to provide a defense against the advantages and adverse devices of foreign nations, and to secure in perpetuity for our commerce the services of an adequate American marine.

"These conventions, save one, with two years remaining, have long since run out their time. They were based on 'reciprocity,' but we have now no ships, and reciprocity has vanished. No longer is there a pretense of equity or usefulness in them. While they continue there seems to be the shadow of an excuse for calling on Congress for 'ship subsidy,' as compensation for their injurious action.

"Some have advanced the idea that termination of these conventions would cause retaliation of some sort. That would be unjustifiable. It would be very uncivil treatment, a manifestation of malice, a breach of the peace. It would challenge our freedom, our courage, and our pride. It would mean war, with its 'horrid front.' It would mean a merchant marine with the return of peace—unless the Republic shall go down in defeat. We are a free Nation, and it is known that we can and will defend our rights, our honor, and our national life. The idea of 'retaliation' because we act within our rights to regain our place on the sea; what is it? Nothing but a foolish appeal to cowardice. There will be no 'retaliation' until the nations have lost their senses. Tell the world that we, Americans, dare not by proper legislation recover our lost place as a shipping Nation if you will, but there is no brave nation governed by rulers so simple as to believe it. Only the fearful among the politicians of our own Nation would be such simpletons."

THE TRUE POLICY.

As stated by Mr. Bates, it is clear that there are no treaties that stand in our way to prevent us from enacting a discriminating tariff duty in favor of American ships. It was the policy of the fathers; it built up our merchant marine from a point where it was carrying 17 per cent of our commerce to a point where it was carrying 90 per cent of American commerce in a period of seven years. It does not place additional burdens on the people; it is not a policy of doubtful constitutionality; it is a policy that has been tried and proven effective. It is a policy by which we can restore the American flag to the seas and the American ships to our commercial trade. It is a policy that will enable us to build up the export trade of the American people. It is a policy that will enable us to find foreign markets for our surplus products in agriculture and manufacture. It is a policy that will restore the balance of commerce as well as trade to our Nation. It is a policy that will ultimately overcome the necessity of our paying a foreign balance in gold to European nations and will bring prosperity to all lines of industry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

("I have listened to arguments in favor of subsidies, mail contracts, etc., for the benefit of our merchant marine, but I must acknowledge that I can not now see how either can be made to assist all our shipowners, and I am informed by those who are in a position to know that it will be a hard matter, owing to treaties with other governments, to discriminate against their vessels carrying products of our country to other countries than their own, or bringing the products of those countries here; but I am firmly convinced that the recommendations made by the committee from the New York Maritime Exchange on this subject is the only way that our whole merchant marine can be benefited." Statement made before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904), by Capt. M. W. Tupper, at Brunswick, Ga.)

SPEAKER CLARK BELIEVES IN DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Representative Spight, of Mississippi, the ranking Democratic member of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, had a bill before Congress in 1910 providing for a 5 per cent reduction of duty on all imports in vessels of the United States. On May 20, 1910, the bill was under discussion in the House, and, addressing Representative HUMPHREY, of Washington, who was opposing the Spight bill, Representative CHAMP CLARK (see p. 6635, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD) said:

"I do not want to interrupt your speech, but I will tell you what I do know: That by just exactly that proposition we built up the second greatest merchant marine there ever was on the high seas, and we can do it again."

("Consequently the relief should come, as mentioned by the gentleman who has spoken, in differential duties on indirect importation, and I am heartily in favor of that plan, and possibly a differential duty on exportations in favor of American bottoms." Statement made to the Merchant Marine Commission (1904) by Capt. Henry E. Parker, of Newport News, Va.)

("In my judgment, assistance should be extended, and extended promptly, to ship owners and builders in the shape of more liberal contracts for carrying the mails and by discriminating duties on indirect commerce; that is, commerce coming into the United States in vessels other than those of the country from which they come." Statement by Capt. J. W. McCarrick in behalf of the Norfolk (Va.) Chamber of Commerce before the Merchant Marine Commission (1904)).

("If you suffer the power who looks with jealousy on your rising commerce and with envy on the glory of your Navy to exclude you from the participation of those advantages which of right as being derived from nature belong to you, abandon all thought of an efficient marine and withdraw from the ocean." James Barbour, of Virginia, 1818.)

("There have been a number of ways suggested, but the trouble is we do not try them. The only one that has behind it the logic of actual success is the system of discriminating duties introduced by President Madison." Statement by Lewis Nixon (1904) before the Merchant Marine Commission.)

DISCRIMINATING-DUTY CLAUSE IN UNDERWOOD TARIFF BILL.

On April 7, 1913, Representative UNDERWOOD introduced his famous tariff bill in the House—H. R. 10, 63d Cong., 1st sess.—in which appears the following section in favor of the discriminating-duty policy he advocated three years ago—the policy of the founders of the Republic and of the Democratic Party, as he puts it:

"J. Subsection 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels built in the United States and which shall be wholly the property of a citizen or citizens thereof."

Before its consideration was begun upon the floor the bill was discussed in detail by a caucus of the Democratic Members of the House, resulting in a number of amendments, among which was an amendment of the above-quoted section, so modifying it as to read as follows:

"J. Subsection 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States."

WEAK FEATURES OF UNDERWOOD AMENDMENTS.

There is no question whatever of Representative UNDERWOOD'S sincere desire to see American shipping restored to its old-time power, prestige, and prosperity. But such an accomplishment would have been impossible had his first above-quoted amendment been enacted, because it would only apply to our dutiable imports, which are but 45 per cent of our total imports, and as fully 90 per cent of our entire imports from South America are free of duty, although the trade between the United States and South America is one of the most promising, under any legislation helpful to American shipping, the latter would receive no benefits in that trade under that amendment. But as amended in the Democratic caucus it contained the weakness noted in the original clause, besides which, through the change made, it would result in the use of foreign vessels, probably exclusively, in any subsequent additions to American registration, because under the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, provision was made for the admission of foreign-built American-owned vessels not over 5 years old to American registration. This last-named provision is so far a dead letter in that no foreign vessels have come under American register in the more than a year that has elapsed since its enactment, but vitality would doubtless be infused in that portion of the Panama Canal act if the Underwood section had been adopted. Thus the clause would have been of no benefit whatever to American shipbuilders.

FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS FILE FORMAL PROTESTS.

As soon as the Underwood tariff bill saw light, foreign governments began to file formal protests with the Department of State in opposition to its provisions, on the ground—so far as the newspapers have been able to shed a light that the State Department has not officially shed upon the basis of the protests—that its provisions are in violation of treaties now in force between the United States and other countries. It would seem that this view is sustained by Secretary of State Bryan, if the newspaper reports may be relied upon, because they quote him as suggesting to Senator Simmons, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the omission of the Underwood discriminating section from the tariff bill.

SENATE YIELDS TO FOREIGN PROTESTS.

The Senate committee, seemingly, accepted in toto the view of Secretary of State Bryan, thus sustaining the contentions of foreign governments that the section would violate treaties, and reported the bill to the Senate with the offending section stricken out. Thus it appears that foreign protests are more powerful with the Secretary of State and with the Senate of the United States in protecting foreign shipping engaged in the foreign carrying of the United States than the wishes of a vast majority of the American people that the old American policy of discriminating duties be readopted for the upbuilding of our shipping in foreign trade. American needs are to receive no consideration, evidently, when the remedy of our maritime conditions conflict with or in any way threatens the present foreign monopoly of our foreign carrying!

SENATOR JONES FOR DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington (Republican), has introduced an amendment to the Underwood discriminating duty section which reads as follows:

"J. Subsection 7. That upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported under the provisions of this act in vessels not registered under the laws of the United States, there shall be imposed and collected a duty of 10 per centum ad valorem in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, and on all such goods, wares, and merchandise as are otherwise admitted free there shall be imposed and collected a duty of 5 per centum ad valorem if imported in vessels not registered under the laws of the United States: Provided, That the President is directed to cause to be abrogated without unnecessary delay, and in the manner therein provided, all treaties which contravene this provision; and until so abrogated this provision shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels affected by such treaties."

The foregoing is an infinitely more effective provision than the Underwood clause, in that it applies to 100 per cent instead of but 45 per cent of our imports; that it is an ad valorem increase of 10 and 5 per cent, respectively, as the imports are dutiable or free, instead of a 5 per cent reduction of the duty; and in that it provides for the abrogation of all treaties to the contrary and the repeal of all laws in conflict. It, however, would, unamended, result in the use of foreign-built instead of American-built vessels, due to the provision of the Panama Canal act previously explained. But it is our understanding that Senator JONES has provided for the amendment of his proposed section so as to confine its benefits only to vessels built in the United States or, up to the present time, admitted to American registration.

TO GIVE PUBLICITY TO FOREIGN PROTESTS.

On August 19, 1913, Senator JONES of Washington introduced the following resolution in the Senate (S. Res. 165), which was adopted on August 29, 1913, with an amendment which is included in italics:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate copies of all protests filed against paragraph J, subdivision 7, of Section IV (V as amended) of H. R. 3321, "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," together with copies of all correspondence that has passed between this country and any foreign country relating thereto, and copies of any report or reports prepared or made thereon by any officer of the United States; the subject referred to being the provision in the tariff bill providing for a discount of 5 per cent on all duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported by vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States."

WHY AMERICAN SHIPPING IS SACRIFICED TO PROTECT FOREIGN.

If the Secretary of State shall not decide that it will be incompatible with the public interest for these protests, the correspondence and reports thereon to be made public, Congress and the people at large will be permitted to know the actual basis of such protests. Months ago foreign governments, themselves familiar with the basis of the protests and doubtless also in possession of the report of the Counselor to the State Department thereon, Mr. John Bassett Moore, learned that the Secretary of State regarded the protests of sufficient seriousness to advise Chairman Simmons, of the Senate Finance Committee, to drop the obnoxious section from the tariff bill, which advice Senator Simmons followed, with the approval of the Senate Finance Committee and the Senate itself.

WHY CONGRESS LEGISLATES FOR FOREIGN INSTEAD OF AMERICAN INTERESTS.

Thus the American people may be permitted to know what the reasons are why Congress should feel compelled to abandon a policy upon which it started for the upbuilding of American shipping, thereby perpetuating foreign monopolistic control of American foreign carrying. Possibly the protests may be made public in sufficient time for the House to decide through its conferees in charge of the tariff bill while in conference whether or not the allegations are true and the arguments conclusive, as put forth by foreign governments in opposition to legislation pending in Congress. Certainly a new departure has been made in American government when foreign governments have the temerity to demand and Congress is sufficiently docile to concede that any legislation helpful to American shipping must meet the approval of the governments of the countries whose ships now enjoy a monopoly of our foreign carrying. The time has at last arrived predicted by Thomas Jefferson, in 1791, while Secretary of State in the first administration of President Washington, when "our politics may be influenced by those who command our commerce."

WILL REPRESENTATIVE UNDERWOOD AND THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES YIELD?

At the time of the public discussion of the foreign protests, the recommendations of Secretary of State Bryan, and the action of the Senate Finance Committee in striking out the Underwood discriminating duty section, Representative UNDERWOOD was quoted as saying that the section, if put into force, would not violate any treaties. If Mr. UNDERWOOD adheres to that position, will he and his House conferees refuse to concur in the Senate's action in deference to foreign protests? And will he insist on the amendment being retained and that the first short step in the direction of reviving our shipping in foreign trade be taken?

HOW DEMOCRATS, IF SINCERE, CAN HELP AMERICAN SHIPPING.

If Democrats really desire to enact legislation helpful to American shipping, without conflicting with any treaty, convention, or trade agreement with other nations, they have but to so amend the Underwood discriminating duty section that it will read as follows:

"J. SUBSEC. 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels built in the United States."

A shipbuilding nation is always a shipowning nation; busy builders precede prosperous owners; as builders are busy, shipowners multiply, and provide employment for shipmasters, officers, and seamen. As builders can only turn out ships by keeping American labor employed, it must follow that the principal benefit following the enactment of this legislation will accrue to the skilled and unskilled labor in American shipyards and the men who make the material that goes into the construction of the ship. Such an enactment as above suggested could not be objected to by any foreign nation on the basis of bad faith on the part of the United States. Its benefits are not limited to vessels owned by American citizens or registered under the laws of the United States, but are open to any vessel, wherever owned, so long as it is built in the United States. The above-quoted section avoids, by omitting, that portion of the Underwood section upon which foreign Governments based their protests that the section, if enacted, would violate treaties now existing between the United States and other countries.

THE BEST WAY TO REAPPLY THIS OLD POLICY.

Really, the better way of doing this would be to increase the amount of duty on all imports in vessels not built in the United States, but it does not conform to the method of reenacting the old American discriminating duty policy seemingly now favored by Democrats, and for that reason it is suggested to them in the above phrasing. If the discrimination were applied, however, in the way of an increased duty on all imports in vessels not built in the United States, it would apply to 100 per cent of our imports instead of to but 45 per cent or less applied through a discount in the duty. To apply the policy through an increased duty would increase the revenues of the Government while at the same time helping to build up American shipping in foreign trade. It would do one of two things: It would build up American shipping or increase the revenues sufficiently to extend the free list.

A FAIR TEST OF DEMOCRATIC GOOD FAITH.

There is a wide belief that the Democrats would like to enact effective and enduring American shipping legislation. Here is their chance. It is believed that the Democrats would like to succeed in the enactment of legislation that, so far, has baffled Republican statesmanship. Here is their chance. They struck out the Underwood section, they say, not because foreign Governments objected, but because for the United States to violate its treaties with other nations would be an act of bad faith. No such charge could lie if the above-quoted section should be enacted. Foreign objections would be overcome and a real and enduring benefit conferred upon American shipping in foreign trade. This is a real test of the good faith of Democrats. In all sincerity the above-quoted section is offered to the friends of American shipping in Congress, Democrats and Republicans. Its enactment would be a long step in the direction of building up an American merchant marine. This is a time for deeds—not words. This suggestion is particularly addressed to every member of the conference committees of both House and Senate conferees on the pending tariff bill. Its adoption by them will doubtless lead to its adoption by Congress and approval by the President.

Mr. FLETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me one moment, there has been more or less discussion as to the position that Mr. Franklin, of New York, a distinguished citizen of that city, who is greatly interested in shipping, has taken on this bill. Mr. Franklin gave testimony before the committee. I received to-day a letter from Mr. Franklin, an unsolicited letter; he did not say that it should not be made public, and I ask that it be read to the Senate. It is brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

9 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, August 15, 1916.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GALLINGER: Shipping bill. Referring to the debate on this bill and some remarks that have been made regarding my views upon the subject, I thought it well to take the opportunity of suggesting to you to read over my testimony before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce on Thursday, June 1, 1916, pages 88 to 115, and 120 to 122.

As you well know, I have always considered that all that part of the bill which authorizes Government ownership and operation is exceedingly unwise, as it neither deals with or helps in any way the present emergency, nor does it establish any sound principle for the ground upbuilding of the American merchant marine in the foreign trade. Therefore I think, if passed, it will be prejudicial to the best interests of the American merchant marine in the foreign trade.

As you are aware, I have never been opposed to the shipping board, but that board should be one created with the object of helping to develop American shipping in foreign trades by carefully investigating the whole situation, and then making its recommendations to Congress as to what is necessary to be done in the way of relieving and assisting shipping.

This board should have under its jurisdiction everything pertaining to administering the shipping laws of this country, and the rules and regulations governing shipping, similar to the Board of Trade of Great Britain.

This board should consider that it is responsible for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine through the encouragement of private owners and operation, which is the only proper, healthy, and lasting manner in which the American flag can expect to compete in foreign trades with the foreign flag.

This board should not be created as a club to be held over the heads of shipping, before the country has any shipping of its own for foreign trades, but should be created with a view of fostering, encouraging, and assisting American individuals and corporations to invest their capital in steamers for foreign trades and commerce.

There never was a better opportunity for Americans to enter the foreign trades than the present, but if they know that they might have to compete with Government owned and operated steamers and services it will be impossible to interest capital.

With kindest regards, I am,
Yours, very truly,
P. A. S. FRANKLIN.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Franklin gave his testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, as the report shows. It appears on page 88 and the following pages in the hearings. I certainly understood from his statement that he not only has no objection to the creation of this board, but that he has no objection to the powers given the board in the bill. I think his statement will so appear. However, that is immaterial. His statement is a matter of record.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. ASHURST. Out of order I ask leave to submit a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent to make the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15575) to amend the act of March 22, 1906, entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," and I submit a report (No. 798) thereon. I ask the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the report.

Mr. JONES. That is purely a local bill. It has passed the House of Representatives and has been recommended by the Department of the Interior, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with a Senate resolution of July 17, 1915, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 21, 1916.

SIR: In compliance with the Senate resolution dated July 17, 1916, there is inclosed herewith a statement of the scores made by the Atlantic battleship fleet in division practice and battle practice, conducted during the year 1915–16.

The inclosed tables are figures of merit based upon all the elements entering into effective gunfire, in which the score—that is, the percentage of hits to shots fired—is one; there are other elements of nearly equal importance, which are also taken into consideration in calculating the ship's final merit.

It is not considered compatible with the public interest to publish the various elements from which these figures of merit are calculated.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

IMMIGRATION—INCOME TAX.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I have two resolutions which were adopted by the Pocatello Central Labor Union, of Pocatello, Idaho, which is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Resolution No. 1 refers to the immigration bill, H. R. 10384, and resolution No. 2 relating to the giving of publicity to income-tax returns. I am heartily in sympathy with the legislation to which these resolutions refer. I also have a letter written by the secretary of the Pocatello Central Labor Union, Mr. G. W. Wilklow, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD, as it explains something of the purposes of the Pocatello Central Labor Union. It is an organization composed of delegates from all of the local unions listed on the letterhead, which will appear in the RECORD, and they assemble for the purpose of discussing any measure that may be of interest to the affiliated locals or the working people at large. Their organization is educational and somewhat unique. They study educational problems and labor legislation. Yet partisan politics is barred, and members of all political parties belong to this union, and all matters that come before them are discussed from the angle of man's relation to man.

I ask unanimous consent to have the resolutions and the accompanying letter from the secretary printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the order? I could not hear the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are resolutions of a labor association with reference to the immigration bill, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it in the shape of a petition, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. So the Senator from Idaho stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is to be done with it? Is it to be printed in the RECORD or made a document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asked that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POCATELLO CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Pocatello, Idaho, July 26, 1916.

Resolution No. 1.

To the United States Senators, greeting:

Whereas immigration bill H. R. 10384, advocated and urged by the American Federation of Labor, passed the House of Representatives on March 30, 1916, by a vote of 307 ayes to 87 nays; and
Whereas this bill is of vital importance to the working class; and
Whereas the passage of this bill has been juggled and delayed for years, we feel it consistent at this time to especially urge that our Senators give this bill their entire support: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we ask your immediate support by voice and vote to secure its passage at this session of Congress.

Resolution No. 2.

To the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of Idaho, greeting:

Whereas after due investigation it has been proven that the United States Treasury is being defrauded of thousands of dollars through income-tax frauds and evasions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be urged to support an amendment to the income-tax law providing for the publicity of the income-tax returns, in order that violators may be exposed and the fraudulent practices stopped.

Respectfully submitted.

POCATELLO CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
G. W. WILKLOW, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES H. BRADY,
United States Senator from the State of Idaho.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of Central Labor Union of Pocatello, Idaho, I was instructed to send you a copy of resolutions designated as resolutions Nos. 1 and 2.

For your information I will state that the Central Labor Union is composed of delegates from the local unions listed above.

The delegates assemble for the purpose of discussing any issue that may be of interest to our affiliated locals or to the working class of people at large.

Our meetings are most interesting, decidedly educational, and somewhat unique, in that while we make a study of labor legislation yet partisan politics is barred, and while we have members who are Republicans, Democrats, Prohibitionists, Socialists, and others, yet all issues are discussed from one angle—man's relation to man.

We note with pleasure that some of the Congressmen from Idaho stand boldly before the lobbyists at Washington and proclaim that, after all, the workingman is a human being and has a right to be heard on issues that are of vital importance to his class. From time to time we receive bulletins, pamphlets, statistics, speeches, reports on hearings, etc. All this literature goes on our library table at the Eagle Hall, where all the laboring men of our little town have access to it. If you come across anything along this line that you think would tend to educate and make a better citizen of the workingman, please see that we receive a copy for our library.

Respectfully, yours,

G. W. WILKLOW, Secretary.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a brief table concerning the imports and exports of merchandise, with a brief explanatory text.

Average ad valorem in 1915, 12.45 per cent.

In May, 1915, seven of the above products showed an increase in imports over May, 1914, amounting to $4,778,361.

The imports in May, 1916, show a very decided increase over imports in May, 1915, and May, 1913, under the Payne law.

The imports of 24 products, viz, aluminum scrap, breadstuffs, automobiles and parts, watches and parts, cotton cloths, embroideries, lace and lace articles, nets or nettings, linen handkerchiefs, yarns, fish, fruits and nuts, hides and skins, tinplate, leather and tanned skins, leather gloves, paper and manufactures, perfumery, etc., seeds, silk manufactures, vegetables, shingles and laths, wood pulp, wool, and Angora hair, in May, 1916, were valued at $54,175,004; in May, 1915, $36,512,465; and in May, 1913, $27,621,631, and it is an important fact that the imports in May, 1916, are double what they were in May, 1913, and increased $17,662,539 over May, 1915, and to make this statement perfectly clear the above figures refer to the 24 products, which show an increase.

There is a decrease in May, 1916, in the imports of the following products, viz, aluminum manufactures, clocks and parts, cotton stockings, cotton knit goods, eggs, plate glass, other glass, cutlery, enameled ware, meat and dairy products, oilcloth and linoleum, films and plates, artificial silk, and wool manufactures, the totals showing that the imports in May, 1916, were valued at $3,212,119; in May, 1915, $4,010,573; in May, 1913, $3,823,591.

The total imports of the entire 38 products in May, 1916, were valued at $57,387,123; in May, 1915, $40,523,038; in May, 1913, $31,445,222, which again shows imports in May, 1916, nearly doubling those in May, 1913.

The total imports of all merchandise in May, 1916, was valued at $229,188,957; in May, 1915, $142,284,851; in May, 1913, $133,723,713; and again the imports in May, 1916, very nearly doubles imports in May, 1913, under the Payne law.

It has been claimed that the Underwood law had not been in effect long enough before the beginning of the foreign war to show whether imports would diminish or increase, but those who have carefully watched import results have known that imports have been constantly increasing ever since the above law became operative, and the very heavy increase in imports, beginning in October, 1915, and continuing to the present time indicates that the Underwood law can be depended on to land in this market about double the amount of competitive merchandise that entered under the operation of either the Dingley or the Payne law, and it is not to be wondered at that American manufacturers are not only alarmed at the import possibilities at the end of the foreign war, but have just reason to be alarmed at the foreign competition they must meet at the present time.

Every week Japan sends to this market new lines of merchandise at prices with which no American manufacturer can begin to compete, and while the amount received of the various lines is not large, the fact that they send new lines of merchandise at all indicates that Japan is feeling this market out and eventually will send large quantities of such merchandise, and nothing will protect our manufacturers from Japanese cheap labor except a revision of the tariff, making rates high enough to offset the difference in wages.

Both hosiery and knit-goods manufacturers have been unable to compete with the foreign prices since the Underwood law became operative and see no hope for relief from the operation of any antidumping law so far proposed when the flood of merchandise arrives here following the close of the foreign war.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, some days ago I offered an amendment to the pending bill, which must be my excuse, if any is needed, for occupying a few moments with some observations regarding the import of that amendment and, incidentally, concerning the bill itself.

I am not particularly enamored of the shipping bill in its present form. It has been emasculated to such a degree that it is somewhat difficult to recognize it as a survival of the bill which was under discussion in the last Congress. I would have been much better satisfied if the committee having the bill in charge had persisted in retaining the principal features of the House bill and presenting it to us in that form, because I believe it would be much better for the interests of the country, and certainly more in accord with my views of what such a bill should contain, than the one we are considering. But, Mr. President, I long ago learned that this is a world of compromises, and that it is practically impossible in most if not at all times to secure everything necessary or desirable in legislation.

There is one feature of the bill, however, Mr. President, as it comes from the committee which commands my warmest approval. It is that which permits the vessels belonging or to belong to the United States and to be purchased under the bill to participate in the coastwise traffic of the country. It would be an anomaly if we should enact a bill providing for the equipment, purchase, and construction of merchant vessels by the Government of the United States and at the same time forbid them to transact the coastwise traffic of the country.

When we consider the strangle hold which the coastwise shipping trust has upon the business interests and upon the Government of the United States, however, it would not be surprising if it were strong enough to exclude our publicly owned merchant ships from our domestic waters.

I am glad, therefore, that this bill as reported from the Senate Committee on Commerce recognizes not only the right but the duty of providing in terms that vessels publicly owned or operated or through the agency of the Government shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges appertaining to privately owned vessels.

Mr. President, perhaps it is generally known how extensive the coastwise shipping trust is, but perhaps the extent to which it has impressed its interests upon the legislation of the country is not fully known. We know generally that vessels may not do a port to port business, and that coast to coast vessels are confined to their terminal points, while those engaged in over-seas traffic are outlawed altogether. But an embargo has been laid upon the possibility of Government competition.

Mr. President, during the past two years the shipping facilities of the world have been taxed as never before. Old, worn-out, and unseaworthy vessels have in many instances been resurrected and repaired and used in the transaction of the traffic of the world. Ocean rates have soared skyward. Ships pay for themselves in a single voyage, and every shipyard in the world is clamorous with the metallic voices of construction.

We own a number of vessels, used principally by the War Department, some perhaps by the Navy, which might have been available to relieve the stress and the demand laid upon the shipping capacity of the country, but for the limitations and restrictions imposed by previous legislation upon their use as agencies of commerce.

I do not know to what extent during the last two years the capacity of our transports has been taxed for governmental purposes, but I have some information to the effect that these vessels have frequently been compelled to make both outward and return voyages, carrying ballast for lack of a sufficient cargo.

If it had been possible, and it would have been but for existing legislation, to have transferred temporarily into the channels of commerce this unused cargo capacity, its effect not only upon ocean transportation but upon rates of ocean transportation probably would have been sensibly apparent. Because of these laws that has been impossible.

In the Army appropriation act approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stats., 1170), I find this section:

That no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the payment of the expenses of using transports in any other Government work than the transportation of the Army, its supplies and employees; and when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, accommodations are available, transportation may be provided for the officers, enlisted men, employees, and supplies of the Navy, the Marine Corps, and for members and employees of the Philippine and Hawaiian governments, officers of the War Department, Members of Congress, other officers of the Government while traveling on official business, and without expense to the United States, for the families of those persons herein authorized to be transported, and when accommodations are available, transportation may be provided for general passengers to the island of Guam, rates and regulations therefor to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Here, Mr. President, is a statute which prohibits the Government of the United States from the use of its transports for any other than Army purposes, regardless of the demands of traffic, regardless of the fact that vessels might easily take cargo in freight and in merchandise, becoming thereby a source of revenue to the Government and at the same time facilitating and easing the burden of traffic because of the added facilities.

There is no question, Mr. President, but that this statute had its inception in the so-called coastwise shipping trust, and that through its influence it was written into the statutes of the United States, and is to-day in full operation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to suggest to the Senator that when during and after the Spanish-American War we bought a large number of transports, paying large sums of money for them, it was not two years before there was a demand made by the owners of ships that those ships should be sold, and the result was that the Government put them out and sold a great many of them at about one-sixth the price that the Government paid for them.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President; that is true. The demand was made and it was obsequiously complied with.

Mr. President, this combination a little later on was overtaken with a remarkable spasm of generosity and magnanimity. We have a little island lying like a little wart on the surface of the Pacific—the island of Guam. I do not know how much traffic it enjoys or to what extent shipping facilities are necessary for the transaction of the traffic.

However that may be, this combination so relaxed its strangle hold upon the Government as to permit it to transact a little business by the use of American transports with the island of Guam. I read from the act of March 3, 1911:

Provided, That hereafter when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, accommodations are available, transportation on vessels of the Army transport service may be furnished the officers, employees, and enlisted men of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and their families, without expense to the United States, and also secretaries and supplies of the Army and Navy department of the Young Men's Christian Association: Provided further, That hereafter when there is cargo space available without displacing military supplies, transportation may be provided for merchandise of American production consigned to residents and mercantile firms of the island of Guam, rates and regulations therefor to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. President, if I am correctly informed, this is the only instance in which vessels belonging to the Government of the United States are permitted to carry merchandise in transit from one place to another. The little, insignificant, microscopic island of Guam, so small, Mr. President, as to be negligible physically, geographically, politically, and commercially, has been taken under the shadow of the wing of this great monopoly and the Government graciously permitted to use cargo space in its transports.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Colorado that the island of Guam is absolutely insignificant in its commerce. It is so small that I do not believe there are a dozen houses there which sell goods that are taken from the United States. No sales are made but to individuals who may be stationed there who are connected with the Army or the Navy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I assumed that; I had to assume it, because if it were otherwise this concession never would have been made.

So, Mr. President, if there was nothing to recommend the shipping bill but the amendment reported by the Senate Committee on Commerce to the House bill providing that these vessels could be used in the coastwise traffic, it would of itself be a blessing to the people of the United States, and should command the support of everyone who believes that this combination, so long in control of our coastwise traffic, should be broken. I should support the bill, therefore, Mr. President, notwithstanding its more objectionable features because of its inclusion of this amendment with its other features.

But, Mr. President, as I said when taking the floor, it was my main purpose to call attention to the amendment which I offered to the bill on the 5th of August. I will read it:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refuses or declines to accept or receive freight or cargo tendered for such port of destination or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, by any citizen of the United States, unless the same is so declined or refused because such vessel or other vehicle is fully laden and has no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle.

Mr. President, this amendment was suggested by some events following the official announcement of what is known as the British black list, and with which the Senate is too familiar to require any extended reference to it. Suffice it to say that shortly after this black list was announced—indeed, I think, immediately afterwards—the protests to the State Department, the obvious duty of that deparment, irrespective of them, and the obvious injustice of the order focused public attention upon it. The State Department, as I am informed, immediately concerned itself, its inquiries being followed by a vigorous letter of protest, to which an answer is soon expected. I have no doubt the department will exercise every available authority for the protection of American merchants and of merchants doing business in the United States against an order to be made extraterritorially effective.

Mr. President, there can be no question but that a government may resort to any means which, in its opinion, is necessary to self-preservation, however great the resulting injury to private interests and business. There is no question but that the British Government has the right, perhaps even in times of peace, to forbid its subjects from creating or continuing commercial relations with other countries or with specific individuals in other countries. The United States resorted to that means during the Civil War by singling out and blacklisting certain firms who were suspected of being engaged in commerce with the so-called insurgents. Great Britain protested, but the Government sought to make its embargo as effective as possible.

There can be no question about the right or the power or, if in the judgment of the Government it is necessary, the duty of that Government to issue such orders as the one which I am discussing and to enforce them vigorously within its own jurisdiction. With that we can have no quarrel, whatever the injury to the citizens of our own country, but, Mr. President, when any Government goes beyond this and utilizes certain other agencies to make its embargo effectual, not only with regard to its own citizens but with regard to commerce everywhere, then a great international question is presented of very serious character, and a situation is also presented which demands, and must receive, the instant consideration of the Executive and, if necessary, the legislative branches of the Government.

Britain controls the seas not only in a naval but in a commercial sense. She has therefore, Mr. President, the power at this time, if she sees fit to exercise it, if it is not capably and effectively resisted, of utilizing her commercial command of the seas to ruin any industry or any individual or any combination of individuals engaged in over-seas trade, which has aroused her animosity or whom she suspects of being unfriendly to her interests or to her welfare. And it is clearly evident that she proposes to use this power.

Mr. President, this so-called "blacklist" was followed almost immediately by the refusal of the masters of vessels plying to American ports and transacting our over-seas commerce to accept cargoes tendered by these blacklisted firms either for points of destination or for points of call, giving as a reason—and doubtless a substantial one—that by so doing they might offend the authorities of the British Empire, and thereby bring serious injury, if not ruin, upon themselves or the owners of their vessels. As a result, these blacklisted firms found themselves largely paralyzed, first, by the withdrawal of all of their British trade; and, second, by the impossibility of securing transportation necessary for the transaction of their business with their other foreign clients.

Mr. President, we can make allowances, and very large ones, for the wrongful acts of nations engaged in war, and especially in a war like this, where each side contends that it is fighting for self-existence; but neutral nations can not afford, and especially the greatest of all neutral nations, to permit this condition to remain unredressed, nor to fail to take such steps in diplomacy, and in such legislation as may be necessary to strengthen the arms of the Executive and make his powers of retaliation effective.

Upon a somewhat cursory examination of the Revised Statutes, Mr. President, I could discover nothing which clothes the executive authorities with the power of summary action whereby, through the swifter processes of administrative efficiency, personal wrongs might be by summary procedure, which can not fail to bring the subject sharply to the attention of the British Government. I did find, however, that on the 21st of May, 1862, Congress enacted a law that was designed to meet a somewhat analogous situation. At that time much trade was in vogue between citizens of the United States and citizens of the Confederacy; much traffic in contraband, munitions of war, and so forth, was being carried on; to suppress which Congress enacted what is now section 5320 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the powers conferred upon him by the act of the 13th of July, 1861, be, and he is hereby, authorized to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with goods, wares, or merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port, whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any part thereof, whatever may be their ostensible destination, are intended for ports or places in possession or under control of insurgents against the United States; and if any vessel or other vehicle for which a clearance or permit shall have been refused by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by his order as aforesaid, shall depart or attempt to depart for a foreign or domestic port without being duly cleared or permitted, such vessel or other vehicle, with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, shall be forfeited to the United States.

That act, Mr. President, became immediately operative, and armed Mr. Lincoln's administration with power of summary action. Under it the Secretary of the Treasury, by refusing a clearance to a vessel under suspicion, could paralyze its activities, and at the same time, if the circumstances provoking action proved to be misleading, the resulting damage would be nominal. On the other hand, without such power the clearance of a vessel loaded with contraband for a port easily accessible by the authorities of the Confederacy or by blockade runners could inflict infinite mischief upon the cause of the Union by giving much-needed support and comfort to those then engaged in its attempted destruction. This is the only statute which I have been able to find that is analogous to the present situation. I therefore framed the structure of this amendment along the lines of section 5320 without, however, including the very rigorous penalty which is there provided for those disobeying the order.

The purpose of this amendment is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever a shipper reports to the proper authority that he has tendered goods in legitimate trade to the owner of a vessel having cargo space for it and that his tender has been refused, to deny a clearance to that vessel and thereby lay an embargo on its departure.

I can conceive, Mr. President, of no better method, no more practical method, for meeting the existing situation and reply to the refusal of the masters and owners of vessels to carry American cargo, when there is sufficient space, because the consignor happens to be in disfavor with one of the belligerent Governments, than by saying to its skipper, "You can not sail at all, but must remain here without your proper clearance papers or other papers of identification until this cargo is accepted." I believe, Mr. President, that if this amendment is adopted, and we clothe the Government of the United States with this authority, it will not be exercised more than once before the whole subject will be swiftly and satisfactorily disposed of, and the present cause of controversy between the two Governments be brought to an end.

I think there is no man, I care not what his sympathies may be in this war, who does not resent this exercise of an extraterritorial power through the mandate which is, impliedly at least, laid upon all vessels engaged in the over-seas trade. thus crushing American citizens and American firms who have fallen into disfavor, justly or unjustly, with Great Britain, and who, properly denied access to British trade, are entitled to trade with the people of other countries, whether Great Britain is pleased or displeased, is injured or uninjured.

Mr. President, I believe that such a statute is a good one independently of the emergency which induced me to offer it. Why should not the Government of the United States have the power at all times to deny clearance to all vessels engaged in over-seas traffic which refuse an American cargo for which the freight charges are paid, and which is not otherwise objectionable, when there is available cargo space for it?

Many people apprehend dire consequences to our trade and to our industries upon the close of the war. They see the specter of pauper labor, crippled and bleeding, and therefore more formidable than ever, engaged in the production of multitudinous articles of merchandise, only waiting for the restoration of peace to dump them upon the shores of this country and sell them to us as cheaply as possible. While that prospect is purely imaginary, and in any case has no terrors for me, I nevertheless realize that, as the result of hostilities between the allies and the Teutonic Empires, there will be commercial competition and commercial war all over the face of the earth for years after a treaty of peace shall be signed between them, and that if we are to maintain our commercial position and extend it we shall be compelled to meet these opposing forces, not only in other countries but perhaps in our own.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. We have at present no very extensive ocean-going marine. We shall be largely dependent on others, especially if this bill should prove to be as abortive as its opponents seem to think; and the nations which control the bottoms moving upon the surface of the seas and transporting the commerce of the world, sailing under other flags, will be naturally inclined to discriminate wherever they can against the American shipper or the American manufacturer, who, however, by the protection of an amendment like this, will be, because of the authority vested in his Government, amply able to meet and to overcome such threatened possibilities.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator has very correctly said that Britain is the mistress of the seas, both from a naval viewpoint and from a commercial viewpoint. I am in entire sympathy with the amendment that the Senator proposes to this bill; but, assuming that it becomes a part of the law of our country, would it not be possible for Britain—a country which carries most of our freight—to retaliate by saying: "Our vessels which carry your commerce to foreign countries shall not be permitted to land at your ports"?

I am asking for information. What would be the effect of it if Britain saw fit to retaliate?

Mr. THOMAS. Retaliatory legislation is always possible, Mr. President. I am not particularly dismayed by such a prospect, however, first, because we have not any ships the landing of which can be denied——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. We hope to get them, however; I am satisfied that we will get them; and, second, because Great Britain is so absolutely dependent upon the New World for many of the necessities of life just now that there is no danger whatever of that country or any of her allies resorting to such retaliatory measures as the Senator suggested.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The first part of the Senator's answer indicated that he thought I had reference to our vessels. We have not any, so they could not stop us from landing at their ports.

Mr. THOMAS. I did so understand the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But what I had in mind was, suppose they were to say that British vessels should not be permitted to land at any of our ports. What effect would it have?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the statesmen of Great Britain should determine upon such a course and should endeavor to apply it, I think we could stand it a good deal longer than she could. We can get along, we are getting along, without European import commerce at present. The greater portion of our imports comes from other sections of the world. They can not get along, Mr. President, without the things that are going to those countries from all the ports of North and of South America; and surely, under these exigent conditions, I have no fear of any such retaliatory legislation. On the contrary, my impression is that that country will necessarily recognize the investiture of our administration with this power; and its exercise upon one or two occasions will make it impossible for her to make her black list beyond requiring her own subjects to comply with it.

Of course in all matters of this kind, Mr. President, retaliation is to be expected, or at least possibly anticipated, for nations are like individuals; that which one does which provokes resentment necessarily suggests and frequently produces retaliation. In this instance, however, we are not the aggressors. We are merely performing a duty which the Government owes to its citizens, and we are seeking to make its performance effective by arming it with power to act effectively and as expeditiously as any exigency may require.

On the 11th day of August, Mr. President, the New York Times published this telegram. The headlines are:

Allies won't change black-list policy, says Cecil, despite neutral protest.

Of course this is unofficial.

LONDON, August 11.

"Personally, I can not see any way by which we can forego our undoubted right to prevent our subjects from providing resources of trade to our enemies," said Lord Robert Cecil, minister of war trade, in discussing to-day with American newspaper correspondents the latest developments in Great Britain's economic warfare.

Of course, Mr. President, the United States has no power, and if it had the power I do not think it would exercise it at present, to question the right of Great Britain to prevent her subjects from providing resources of trade to her enemies. That is not our complaint. Our complaint is that Great Britain goes far beyond this, and is exercising what is not only not an "undoubted right" but an undoubted wrong in seeking to prevent citizens of the United States from trading with neutral nations.

He proceeds:

"There is not likely to be any change in the policy of the allies as a result of neutral protests. Italy by her action in announcing a black list is merely following the policy outlined at the Paris conference."

Lord Robert confirmed reports published in financial circles that outstanding contracts of British insurance companies with firms on the British black list will not be interfered with by the Government.

Discussing relations with Sweden, the war-trade minister called attention to the exchange of notes between Great Britain and Sweden, which correspondence is ready to be laid on the table of the House of Commons. He pointed out that one note dispatched by the foreign office to the Swedish Government claimed that both the Swedish Government and the German Government admitted that The Hague convention of 1907 concerning mail rights was inoperative in the present war because it had not been ratified by all the nations attending the conference.

Lord Robert said there had been no change in the policy of Great Britain regarding the Netherlands over-seas trust.

"I do not know the facts on which American shippers are basing their complaints," he said, "but I assure you that we have not changed our attitude toward the trust. I can explain, however, a possible detention on the clause of the agreement which specifies that the Government has a right to detain any trust consignment until doubt as to its destination has been satisfactorily explained."

American shippers to Holland are bombarding the British Government with protests because of the detention of cargoes consigned to the Netherlands over-seas trust. It is understood here that their protest may be supported by diplomatic action at Washington.

In April of last year, replying to a protest from Washington over the detention of the American steamship Seguranca, the foreign office made the following promise: "While His Majesty's Government does not require cargoes to be consigned to the Netherlands Over-seas Trust, it does accept a consignment in that form as proof that the cargo is intended for bona fide consumption in Holland."

This was widely circulated in the United States, not only in the press but in the form of circulars issued by British consulates and various chambers of commerce.

In the last two months between 35 and 40 consignments to the Netherlands over-seas trust have been held up, some in bonded warehouses in Holland, awaiting action, while others have actually been placed in the prize court. American shippers complain that the British Government has not adhered to its pledge, and it is expected they will seek the assistance of the State Department.

Mr. President, this is anything but a candid statement, because it ignores the real point in controversy. What Great Britain is doing indirectly is to force the owners of Dutch vessels, of Swedish vessels, of Norwegian vessels, and of other vessels plying between American and foreign ports to refuse to receive consignments of goods for any of those countries from American shippers whose names are upon this blacklist. That is the proposition, and one which I think can be effectually dealt with, in part at least, by the proposed amendment.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what others in the United States engaged in foreign trade and who are not blacklisted are required to do at present. I have received a letter from a gentleman in New York who, for reasons satisfactory to himself at least, does not desire the disclosure of his name, who says:

A department has been opened in the British Embassy at Washington to which an American exporter can go and give particulars of the nature and amount of the goods he desires to export, and also the name of the consignee. The department will at once cable here to the contraband committee, who will cable him whether his goods would pass the blockade or not, and thus he can decide whether to ship them. If he ships the goods the papers are marked accordingly, and some American lines will now only take goods which have passed the inquiry.

The truth is that an American exporter is compelled to apply to the trade department of the British Embassy, giving full particulars of the goods he intends to ship by neutral steamers. He is invariably charged with the cable expense incurred by the embassy. It sometimes takes 2 weeks, sometimes 10 weeks, before the British Government announces its decision. At times applications are ignored altogether and the exporter does not know where he stands.

I do not vouch, of course, for the correctness of this statement.

If the shipper is fortunate enough to get the "letter of assurance" he must so arrange as to ship the goods within eight weeks from date of issue, after which period the "letter" becomes void. If the embassy refuses to grant the permit, he is not even given the opportunity of deciding whether or not to ship the goods, for no steamship company will take his shipment without the "letter." In consequence the shipper loses the sale, and has no remedy whatever.

As can be seen, this scheme gives England the dangerous power of declaring an embargo in American ports upon whatever goods she objects to being shipped to Scandinavian countries.

Mr. President, that is true if the premises are correctly stated; and there is no question but that the ingenuity of the British commercial world is sufficiently active and alert to take advantage of this condition, and supplant the American exporter in the business he is doing, and to which he is entitled, with these neutral nations.

I trust, therefore, that the amendment which I have submitted for the consideration of the Senate will receive its approval, and be made a part of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I make no apology for discussing the measure which I am going to discuss while another measure is before the Senate, for the reason that it is altogether probable that if I discuss it at all I must do so while another measure is pending.

The immigration bill which is now upon the calendar has passed Congress twice substantially in its present form. It passed Congress by an overwhelming vote in both instances. It was vetoed twice. The measure is one which is fully understood in all its details by the Members of this body and pretty well understood in all its details by the country. I do not see why much time should be necessary in its discussion, and my opinion is that it could be taken up and disposed of without any considerable expenditure of time. Certainly there is no justification for any extended debate, and I assume that there would be no debate purely for the purpose of delay. The bill in all essential particulars is the same as passed last Congress and was vetoed by Mr. Wilson. It would have doubtless passed over his veto but for the activity of the executive departments.

If the bill were one that was just in its shaping, or its provisions such as had not been thoroughly discussed heretofore, there might be some reasons for its postponement at this session, in view of the lateness of the session, the heat, and other inconvenient environments. But in view of the fact that it has been thoroughly discussed and is understood in all its effects and terms I can see no reason why we should not take it up and dispose of it at this session; that is, no reason so far as the Congress is concerned.

Mr. President, I regard the bill as of the utmost importance. It is important in its bearings and in its effect, and would be so at any time and under any conditions which obtain in this country; but it is peculiarly important by reason of the conditions which, in my judgment, will prevail at the close of the great conflict now going on in Europe. We ought to have our fences up and be thoroughly prepared to protect those in this country who will be brought into competition with the hordes of people who will come here, in my judgment, at the close of the war. No subject could more concern or better engage this Congress than that of protecting our laborers and our country in general against the conditions which will then confront us.

We have prepared for other contingencies and conditions. We have provided an ample Navy and, in the judgment of some, a fairly well organized land force. It is just as important—indeed, sir, I think more important—that we should prepare for peace, for the industrial conditions which shall confront us when the war shall have closed. We can never acquit our full obligations to the working people of this country and to our citizenship if we adjourn this Congress without action in this particular.

We all hope, Mr. President, that the battleships which we are going to build will never be put in actual use, that they will rot unused upon the sea. It is our hope that any Army for which we may have provided may never be called into action; and it is reasonably probable that neither of these forces will be called into actual use. But the conditions which will confront us at the close of the war are inevitable. We can not escape from the situation as it will then be developed. Whatever may be the result as to the other preparedness, whether it shall be necessary as we have contemplated it or not, the preparedness for industrial peace and industrial conditions is necessary.

It seems to me, Mr. President, after having devoted so much time to the other forms of preparedness, it would be well if we would take up this measure and meet a real emergency and deal with a real condition, and undertake to ameliorate and control a real situation which will confront and environ and embarrass every man who labors at whatever calling it may be in this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to make a statement in behalf of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the Committee on Immigration. The Senator from South Carolina is absent at the bedside of a member of his family who is ill, and he requested me if this question was raised in the Senate, particularly if a motion was made, to state to whatever Senator was about to make the motion that it is his purpose as chairman of the committee to move to take up the immigration bill during the present session and before its close. I want the Senate and the country to have that information.

Mr. BORAH. I am exceedingly pleased to have that statement from the Senator on behalf of the Senator from South Carolina. I wish to say in reply to the Senator from Georgia that if the Senator from South Carolina will make that motion, and those who are in favor of the bill on the other side will give to the Senator from South Carolina their support, the bill will undoubtedly be passed at this session. Nothing can prevent its passage except a slavish betrayal of duty.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, I will also state that the junior Senator from South Carolina is expected to be back to-morrow morning.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; there will be plenty of time after to-morrow morning to make the motion. I repeat, if the Senator from South Carolina will make the motion, which I have no doubt under the statement of the Senator from Georgia he will do, and if those on the other side who favor the bill will vote for it, there can be no possible doubt about its passage at this session. This side of the Chamber stands ready to support the bill.

It is a question, Mr. President, of our having an opportunity to vote our convictions upon this measure. I venture to say that out of the 96 Senators in this Chamber, or having seats in this Chamber, if the bill is ever brought to a vote, from 85 to 90 of them will vote in support of the measure.

It is an astounding situation that a bill which has twice passed Congress by an overwhelming majority and has in this Chamber such unanimous support should be postponed even for a week. It is a situation, Mr. President, which does not speak in complimentary terms of the most distinguished deliberative body, as we are fond of saying, in the world. It presents to us the question whether or not we are dealing in candor and in courage with a situation which we know to be real. It does not speak in complimentary terms of this body, knowing the situation as we know it and the conditions which will confront the laboring men of this country at the close of the war, if we postpone or trifle with the situation or with a measure designed to ameliorate that situation to some extent at least. In the name of candor and fair dealing, in the name of honor, among public men let us place duty above supposed party expediency.

If there was a divided Senate, if there was a divided sentiment here to any great extent in regard to it, it might be said that there would be interminable debate and possibly defeat in the end; but, I repeat, I doubt if there are 10 Senators in this Senate Chamber who are opposed to the bill to the extent that they would vote against it if the bill should be brought to a final vote. Surely so important a measure is entitled to consideration; surely men will not side-step or dodge this kind of an issue.

Mr. President, it is the history of all great wars that large immigration follows immediately after the struggle is over. I said the history of all great wars; I should have said of wars in Europe. It has been almost invariably the rule that when the conflict shall have closed there is a large emigration from the regions of country over which the conflict was waged.

I shall not detain the Senate in going back and recounting those instances, but every Senator will recall them. It is for the reason that war disturbs the family relations, breaks up old friendships, pulls men out of the grooves to which they are accustomed and puts them in another line of life; for the reason that the country in which their homes were situated may have been scourged by war, the discouragement and disappointment environing the man as he leaves his regiment or his army and starts back to his home, and he naturally seeks a place where he may begin life under different conditions, where he may seize if possible new opportunities, and especially where he may escape what he believes to be conditions which it is not within his power as an individual to mollify or overcome. He is restless for other climes, and all places seem better than the place cursed by the memory of his sacrifices.

Then again, Mr. President, when this great war shall have closed the tremendous debt which will be hanging over those belligerent countries will be a warning to every man of whatever station of life or of whatever occupation, that for years and years, for him and his children and his children's children, there is to be that depressing weight upon him and his in the struggle of life. The debt which will exist at the close of the war no one can estimate, but it is now running up to where it is estimated at about fifty to sixty billion dollars. Who can estimate the misery, the sorrow, the sacrifice involved in the fact that those belligerent countries after the cannon shall cease to roar will have fastened upon the labor of those countries, upon the industry of the countries, such an insuperable, almost inconceivable burden which must be paid at last through the toil and sacrifice of the man in the street, in the mines, and in the factory. From this they will seek to escape as from some slow consuming curse.

Do not mistake, Mr. President, that those in the ordinary walks of life understand that just as well as those in the higher walks of life who undertake to deal with high finance. Even if they do not appreciate it as those more trained in that mysterious science appreciate it, yet its nebulous undefined menace comes to them with more force for the reason that they can scarcely comprehend it than if they could weigh and analyze and devise schemes and means by which it could finally be liquidated. All they understand is that it is there and must be met by taxes for which they must suffer.

So, Mr. President, these things and a multitude more will encourage every man who is not fastened in some way to the land of his birth to seek new fields and new opportunities, and where will they go? To what country will they turn their face? Toward the great Republic of the West, and they will come in direct competition with the men in this country just so surely as times goes on. Now, sir, in so far as practicable I would alleviate those conditions, but I can not get my consent to do so at the cost of hunger and destitution, of the misery and sacrifice of our own people.

But that is not all. There is a deeper and a broader question involved, and that is that it is obligatory upon every generation, and particularly upon this, in view of the tremendous conditions prevailing in Europe, to protect the citizenship of this country, to keep up the average standard of citizenship, that this great Republic of ours may rest in safety upon the shoulders not of the few, not of the public men alone, but upon the shoulders of the average man, for there and there alone is the foundation rock upon which this Republic must rest in every crisis. If I could feel that our laws and the administration of our laws were in the future to be such as would be conducive to the health and morals, the prosperity and happiness, of the average citizen of our country I would feel confident, wholly confident, of the future. This country will never be wanting in the ability of individual men, in intellectual power, but it may be wanting in justice, in that equitable distribution of this world's wealth and this world's blessings essential to a sound and wholesome democracy.

Mr. President, why should we delay? Why should we postpone the consideration of a measure that has now received the commendation and common judgment of the representatives of the people upon two separate occasions, and would receive it again if some mysterious, subtle, indefinable, inscrutable, incomprehensible power were not preventing its consideration? The question before this Congress is not, Is this bill wise or just that we have settled? But the question is, Shall we have the courage to challenge the power which opposes its passage?

It is said that so many people will have been slaughtered in the war that we need have no fear. I was enlightened a few weeks ago by reading an editorial in one of the great metropolitan dailies to the effect that there would be no occasion for immigration laws after the war shall have closed; that there would be such a sacrifice of life that we must necessarily conclude there would be no occasion for an undue amount of immigration in this country. There is in those belligerent countries a population estimated at 450,000,000. If we make the estimate according to the ordinary rule, that would give us in those belligerent countries 90,000,000 working people; rather I should say 90,000,000 adult people, and according to the ordinary estimate 80 per cent of the adults perform labor in some way, occupy themselves in the industrial world so that they may be classed as laborers. That leaves about 72,000,000 adult workingmen in those countries. Suppose we assume that even 10,000,000 shall have been sacrificed in this war, we still have 62,000,000 of workingmen in the belligerent countries alone. Then we have this other fact which they refuse to consider, that the women of those countries have passed into the lines of industry and taken the place of the men until you have practically the entire vacancy, as it were, caused by the enlistment of men supplied by the women workers of those countries. And when we contemplate the tremendous output of the industries of those countries, how fully and completely labor is meeting the situation, how can we doubt that the close of the war and the return from the field of war will find an overcrowded labor field?

You will not, Mr. President, at the close of this war have any less workmen, including the women, than you had in these countries at the beginning of the war, notwithstanding the sacrifice. You have the men, the women, and the children, and you have those countries driving those working people to the limit to win back the markets of the world. The situation will not be mollified, we should not suppose it will be mollified, by the unfortunate sacrifice which will be made in this war.

Mr. President, a few days ago we passed what is called the child-labor bill, supposedly, and I hope, a humanitarian piece of legislation. But suppose, Mr. President, that we shall have succeeded in taking the child out of the factory, in depriving it, even amid most uninviting environments and adverse conditions, of its opportunity to work; suppose we shall have taken it from the surroundings which we believe to be calculated to arrest its development and to circumscribe its life and send it to a home of squalor and want and misery—to what extent have we served humanity? Suppose we shall have taken the child out of the factory and sent it to a home where we have, by reason of our immigration laws, deprived the father or mother of a job, displaced some one else occupying the position of those upon whom it is dependent for support. If the parents of this country, the mother and the father are not to be protected in their citizenship, if they are not to be protected in their wage or in their place, we shall have exerted an impotent but ostentatious display of legislative power in taking the child from the factory.

It is incumbent upon this Congress to supplement that legislation by such legislation as will protect the home to which the child is supposed to return and to give its parents their prestige and their place in the industrial world, where they may educate and take care of the child. Otherwise, Mr. President, in attempting to serve humanity we have pursued an ignis fatuus; we have harmed the child instead of helped it.

I gave notice at one time that I should offer the immigration bill as an amendment to the child-labor bill, and a distinguished Senator upon the floor, who is absent now, and the newspapers of the country, to a considerable extent, and especially those who were greatly engrossed in the child-labor legislation, said that there was no kith or kin between these two measures and they should not be in any way embarrassed one by the other.

Is there no relationship between the child in the factory under adverse circumstances and the child who returns home and is turned upon the streets to vagrancy and incipient crime by reason of the fact that its father or its mother may have been reduced in wage by the severer competition which is sure to follow, or even displaced entirely? While I have the utmost sympathy and consideration for the child working in the factory under conditions which may arrest its development and unfit it for citizenship, as between the child in those conditions and the child living upon the streets to the point of vagrancy I have more profound sympathy for the latter.

But, Mr. President, there are some influences which are being exerted against the immigration bill which were not exerted against the child-labor bill. The evils of child labor were said to be confined to five or six States. It is easy, Mr. President, to make an ostentatious display of your humanitarianism when it is at the expense of somebody across the line. But this immigration bill, sir, has its opposition more disseminated throughout the entire country. It affects powerful interests; it affects those who make large contributions to campaign funds; it affects powerful interests in every part of the country; and, therefore, we hesitate and halt in the protection of the mother and the father while we parade our humanitarianism by taking care of the child. I say, sir, we shall have acted the part of hypocrites if we take that child from the factory, unwholesome and dangerous as its surroundings may be, and turn it upon the street to beg or steal because we have failed to protect the workman's home.

Mr. President, when the European war broke out what was the condition of labor in this country? On the 1st day of August, 1914, according to statistics now accepted—and which have become so well accepted as to be beyond the charge of political manufacture—there were out of employment in this country 2,500,000 men. Who has the power to describe the condition which those figures indicate—2,500,000 men out of employment, struggling upon the ragged edge of hunger, with their children asking them for support and for the means which it is not within their power to supply?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Idaho be kind enough to state the authority or the statistics which substantiate the statement that two and a half million men were out of employment on that date?

Mr. BORAH. I get these statistics from a number of sources. These statistics or figures which I take were those which were collected by labor organizations and given in their labor reports. While there is practically no difference in the figures between those given by labor organizations and other gatherers of facts, there were those who estimated the number of men out of employment as high as three million. In addition to that, Mr. President, it was estimated that there were 1,500,000 men working on half time.

I am not going to enter into any field of speculation as to the cause of that condition; I am perfectly willing to take it upon its broadest grounds; but it did exist. That condition confronted us at the beginning of the European war on the 1st day of August, 1914.

As I was about to say, it is impossible to describe the agony and the suffering, the harrowing, and the demoralizing effects upon the citizenship of the country to have men who are willing to work and yet who are unable to find work; to have men who are anxious to support their families, and who are yet unable to do so. If the best-informed and the most thoroughly trained are correct in their conclusions, something of this situation will confront us again after the war, and there will be those who left us by the hundreds of thousands and went their way who will be returning, or those who will be returning in their place, and there will be, in my judgment, hundreds and thousands come with them to take the places of the laboring men in this country.

But, Mr. President, suppose I should be in error and that I overdraw the picture. It reminds me of a statement made by a distinguished divine, who said that if a man accepted and believed the Christian religion, and it turned out to be baseless, no harm was done; but that if a man rejected it, and it turned out to be true, it would undoubtedly be of dire consequences to him.

If, Mr. President, I should be in error as to the situation which will then confront us, perhaps this bill would not be so necessary; but if I should be correct, and if others should be correct in regard to it, it is supremely important; it is eminently essential to the welfare and to the happiness of millions of people of this country.

Why delay? Why postpone? Whom are we going to deceive when the election is over? If we postpone this thing until the 2d day of December, 1916, who is going to be disappointed after the election is over? Who are we getting ready to betray? Let us have it before the great judgment is recorded. Let us hew to the line, let the chips hit whom they may. One party has just as much interest as the other, and one party is calculated to lose just as much as the other. To postpone it until after election is such a manifest and diaphanous scheme of duplicity that I am amazed at the boldness of men who propose it.

Mr. President, I wish to take a few minutes to read, in support of the contentions which I have made, some views of others with reference to this situation. I read from the Independent, under date of May 8, 1916, an article by Isaac Don Levine. He says:

> There has been a great deal of discussion in this country since the war began about the volume of immigration to the United States after the restoration of peace in Europe. There are those who argue that conditions in the Old World will be such after the war is over that there will hardly be any increase in the present rate of immigration, which is negligible. But the overwhelming number of authorities on immigration, among whom are the numerous representatives of immigrant aid societies, as well as most of the United States immigration officials, are of the opinion that immigration to this country after the war will assume unprecedented proportions.
> It may be safely said now that this latter view has come to be generally recognized as the right one. Those who believe that for years to come this country will know no immigration problem disregard economic conditions. They hope for an era of marvelous recuperation and reconstruction in Europe, an attractive hope, but hardly justified by reason * * *
> A canvass of the rank and file of the immigrant body in this country would speedily reveal the fact that with the conclusion of peace in Europe a colossal increase in immigration to America will occur. * * *
> In face of the expected vast stream of immigration, this already important and complicated problem looms up before us in all its new magnitude and demands our immediate attention. As a problem of the near future, as one that vitally concerns all parts of the country and all parcels of the population, it has no equal in urgency and importance. But it is evident that the country has not yet come to realize its full import; for what preparations is she making to meet the rushing current of immigrants? Has the Government taken any steps in the direction of such preparation? Has she devised any means and method to cope with extraordinary conditions? The answers to these questions are all negative.

The learned author says that the country has not awakened to these conditions. Oh, yes; the country has. We all understand them. We all realize them. The people understand them. The citizens generally fully comprehend them, or at least they believe they do; but for some reason or other the learned representatives of the people do not act.

For some reason, Mr. President, this matter of transcendent moment halts; for some reason there is procrastination. Those who most fully understand, sir, the mysterious workings of sinister influences in the beginning of great political campaigns may, if they are sufficiently curious to follow up the sources of suspicion, find the real reason. I should hesitate to name it.

From an article in The New Republic, published April 8, 1916—and, by the way, a publication exceedingly brilliant and well edited—I read the following:

> Freedom of migration from one country to another appears to be one of the elements in nineteenth-century liberalism that is fated to disappear. The responsibility of the state for the welfare of its individual members is progressively increasing. The democracy of to-day is intolerant of disease, degeneracy, poverty. It can not permit these social ills to be aggravated by excessive immigration. The complicated governmental problems of a modern democratic nation demand the intelligent attention of the whole public. And this implies the necessity of a considerable degree of homogeneity. We permit at our peril the planting on our soil of unassimilable communities. It is such considerations that appear to animate the supporters of the Burnett immigration bill, with its added restrictions aimed at mental disease, its literacy test, and increased head tax. The fear is entertained that with the close of the war there will be a huge influx of aliens fleeing from the poverty that will oppress Europe in the immediate future and the wars of revenge that may follow. Poland, Galicia, and Serbia have hundreds of thousands of families uprooted by the war, among whom emigration societies and the agents of shipping companies will find hosts of recruits. These people are largely illiterate; and the Burnett bill, if it becomes law, will close the doors of the United States to them.

Mr. President, what a garden of luxury the great transportation lines and the steamship lines will find in these distracted countries after the war! How they will riot in their endeavor to bring those people out of their unfortunate condition into a land of promise and sunshine! Methinks I see them now upon their errand of mercy, their self-imposed good Samaritanship, advising those people of the jobs and positions awaiting them on this side, not mindful, however, of the imperilment of the happiness and contentment in the home of our own workmen.

I read portions of an article from the Scientific Monthly of May, 1916, by Prof. Robert De C. Ward, of Harvard University:

> A crisis has been reached in our immigration policy. The war has, for the moment, very largely reduced the flow of aliens to our shores. For the first time in many decades we have breathing space. On the other hand, the effects of the war upon the peoples from which our future immigration will come are likely to be far-reaching. This fact will, after the war is over, bring us face to face with many new and difficult problems which need careful consideration at the present time. We must think clearly, decide wisely, and act quickly. We need new immigration legislation. We need it at once.

In another part of the article he says:

> Is immigration likely to be greater after the war than before it? Or are we to witness a general and more or less permanent decrease? Our economists are already considering this question, and Commissioner of Immigration F. C. Howe, of New York, has discussed it in several magazine articles. With most of Commissioner Howe's conclusions we find ourselves in general agreement. The demoralization of industry; the breaking-up of homes; the roving restlessness of millions of men who will never be able to "settle down" again at home; the greatly increased burdens of taxation; the desire to fly from the horrors of future wars; the political, religious, and social readjustments with the almost inevitable oppression and dissatisfaction of multitudes of people; the widespread destitution, misery, and hopelessness; the return to the United States of aliens who went home to fight and who will bring back with them many of their countrymen who have never been here; the desire of the foreign-born already in the United States to bring to America relatives and friends who are still left abroad—these and other causes will operate to bring us an increase in immigration which seems likely to surpass anything that we have ever known. It is easy to see what use the steamship agents will make of the conditions following the war in order to stimulate emigration from abroad.

If the steamship companies have not made their contributions to this campaign, they ought to be called on at once:

> Fly from the horrors of war; escape your taxes; go to a country where there are no wars; where there is no standing army; where wages are high and work is plenty; go to America.
> A considerable proportion of our immigration even in normal times is thus artificially stimulated. What will happen after the war is easy to guess. Already plans are being made by foreign companies for the establishment of new steamship lines to bring emigrants from Europe and Asia to the United States.

Mr. President, I read yet further from this same distinguished author:

> All this is not mere idle speculation. Our statistics show that recent wars have in no case been followed by any permanent decrease in emigration from the countries involved. On the contrary, as Prof. J. W. Jenks has pointed out, these wars have usually resulted in a large and almost immediate increase. After the Franco-Prussian War immigration to this country from Germany and France increased and attained its maximum not many years after the war. Greek immigration increased steadily after the last Turco-Grecian War. The more recent Balkan War was followed by increased immigration from the Balkan States. The numbers from Serbia, Bulgaria, Montenegro, and Greece in the year after that war were nearly double those of the year preceding the war Those who may maintain that immigration will decrease permanently after the present war is over have no statistics on which to base their claim.

* * * * * * * *

THE PROBABLE FUTURE MENTAL AND PHYSICAL CHARACTER OF OUR IMMIGRATION.

No one who has at heart the future of the American race can fail to view with concern the probable effects of the war upon the physical, mental, and moral condition of our immigrants. The introduction of pestilential war diseases, such as cholera, typhus, typhoid fever, and the like is not greatly to be feared, although some of our medical men are already viewing this problem with much concern. On the other hand, the more subtle and much less easily detected venereal diseases, which are always rampant in great armies in war time, and the mental breakdowns, of which there are so many thousands of cases among the soldiers at the front, present another aspect of the health problem which is far more serious Great numbers of soldiers, although not actually afflicted with any specific disease, will eventually come to the United States maimed, crippled, wounded, enfeebled by illness or exposure, or mentally unstable. The fittest mentally and physically, those who in the past have had the initiative and the courage to emigrate, will be dead at the prime of life or will be needed at home to carry on the work of rebuilding and reorganization. These are the men whom Europe will do its utmost to keep at home. The least fit are likely to emigrate.

Many of those who, because of mental or physical disability, will find themselves least able to earn a living abroad, will be the very ones most likely to be "assisted" by relatives and friends in this country to "come to America." Against the emigration of such persons the European Governments will not set up any barriers. There are good grounds, therefore, for expecting, with reasonable certainty, that our immigration in the next few decades after the war will be of a lower physical and mental standard than it has been in the past.

The moral effects of the war are by no means to be disregarded. As Commissioner Howe has clearly pointed out, a widespread demoralization will prevail among the peoples now at war, resulting from life in the army; the breaking off of family ties and responsibilities; the restlessness and difficulty of settling down again after the fighting is over; the craving for freedom and liberty as soon as the military discipline is relaxed. Our future immigration is sure to contain a large proportion of these disturbed, restless, irresponsible men, less amenable to law and order, less disposed to conform to our conditions of life, less easily assimilable, than has been the case in the past. The interruption of the education of multitudes of young men who have been called on for military service, and who will never take up again their scholastic or vocational training, is a serious phase of our general problem. This group will go forth into the world insufficiently and unsatisfactorily prepared for the business of life. For years to come our immigration will include large number of youths and of men whose standards of education will be lower than would have been the case had there been no war.

Standing close behind these idealists—whom the late Gen. Francis A. Walker well termed "optimists beyond all bounds of reason," and using the same eloquent and catchy appeals, come the manufacturer, the landowner, the contractor, the railroad and the steamship man—all profiting directly through the influx of unlimited "cheap labor"; all demanding more "hands," and most of them indifferent as to the conditions of the bodies and of the minds which of necessity go with these "hands." Our large employers of labor naturally enough use the "brotherhood of man" and the "haven of refuge" appeal.

It blinds people to their real motive. Thus many of our idealists have been misled into cooperating with these "big money" interests, not realizing that the true motive which controls these is purely selfish. Another group which is strongly opposed to immigration restriction is made up of the leaders of our foreign-born colonies, mostly contractors, steamship agents, small bankers, newspaper men, and the like, all of whom feed on our recent immigrants, and want the supply to continue as large as possible.

The investor, landowner, and contractor can well afford to preach world-wide brotherhood. The professional man, sitting serene above the arena of struggle, can nobly rebuke narrowness and race hatred. Throughout our comfortable classes one finds high-sounding humanitarianism and facile lips of sympathy for immigrants coexistent with heartless indifference to what depressive immigration is doing and will do to American wage earners and their children. If the stream of immigration included capitalists with funds, merchants ready to invade all lines of business, lawyers, doctors, engineers, and professors qualified to compete immediately with our professional men, even judges and officials able to lure votes away from their own candidates for office, the pressure would be felt all along the line, and there might be something heroic in these groups standing for the equal right of all races to American opportunities. But since actually the brunt is borne by labor, it is easy for the shielded to indulge in generous views on the subject of immigration.

Mr. President, in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for September I find an interesting discussion of "America's interests after the European war." Among others who were discussing these subjects was Mr. Frank Julian Warne, doctor of philosophy, of Washington, D. C., from whose article I quote as follows:

The effect, then, of the present war will be to continue immigration to our shores. I know there are those who believe that the effect of the war will be to diminish the immigration flood. But such an opinion is contrary to the facts of history, and when we try to raise the curtain separating the present from the future and to peer into that future, I submit that history is a much better guide than personal opinion.

Every European war during the past 100 years has been followed by increased immigration to the United States. The struggles of the Napoleonic period were the first of these, and following their termination they swept on to our shores the first large volume of immigration. Next came the wars of the European revolutionary period, when the oppressed populations, freed by the corporal-emperor from the age-long superstition of the divine right of kings, attempted to throw off the yoke of monarchy. Being mostly unsuccessful, these also resulted in increased emigration to the United States. Among these were the Polish revolution against Russia, that of the Bohemians against Germany, the Hungarian revolution, the Belgian insurrection, the wars of Italy, and the revolutionary outbreaks in Germany. The great wars of Prussia in the sixties and the seventies against the Danes, then the Austrians, and later the French, also increased our immigration.

When the present great war is at an end—when the populations of Europe are released from fighting and freed from the manacles of militarism, when they are at liberty to take up again their peaceful occupations—Europe will not be what it was before the war began. Economic maladjustment will have set in, burdensome taxes with which to meet the cost of the struggle will be levied by all the Governments; capital will have been destroyed; even anticipated income will have been spent, and harsh economic conditions will ensue among the people. Economic distress will be inevitable. All this is no prophecy. It is merely the teaching of past wars.

Mr. President, I read further from this astounding article:

But, say some, you must take into consideration the fact that the large number of soldiers being killed in the war will result in decreasing the population there is to draw upon, and this in itself will result in a diminished immigration. Whether a fact is important depends upon the other fact by which you measure it. When we are told that ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand men in the very prime of life have been killed in a bloody battle we shudder with horror and magnify the importance of the number. But, considered only numerically, all the thousands that have been and are still to be destroyed by the war are insignificant when compared with the fact that the great reservoirs of peoples from which we have been drawing most of our immigrants—such countries as Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Greece, Roumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Turkey—that these reservoirs have a combined population in excess of 291,000,000. This is about two and one-fourth times the entire population of England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland—the western European sources of our earlier immigration. These vast reservoirs of peoples have so far barely been even tapped by the large immigration streams that in recent years have been flowing from some of them into the United States.

* * * * * * * *

In view of the possibility that the sluices now retaining the vast multitude of Slavs within the empire are to be raised we must be prepared to meet the pouring forth of a flood of emigrants the like of which the world has never seen and which will make our recent large immigration appear insignificant.

Again, Austria-Hungary has a population of about 47,000,000, some 5,000,000 more than England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. Today it already holds third place among the countries of the world contributing to our foreign-born population. And immigration from that country had only just begun before the war opened. Of the total of more than 3,000,000 arrivals from Austria-Hungary since 1860, more than 2,000,000 came during the 10 years only preceding 1910. All indications point to a continuance of this large immigration from Austria-Hungary at the close of the war. Somewhat similar statements are true of Italian immigration to this country.

Conjecturing in The American Commonwealth, as to the future of immigration, Mr. James Bryce says:

"It may, therefore, be expected that the natives of these parts of Europe, such as Russia, Poland, and South Italy, where wages are lowest and conditions least promising, will continue their movement to the United States until there is a nearer approach to an equilibrium between the general attractiveness of life for the poorer classes in the Old World and in the New."

* * * * * * * *

The immigration from Bulgaria, Serbia, and Montenegro in a single year rose to more than 27,000. During the 10 years preceding 1910 our foreign born from Turkey in Europe increased from less than 10,000 to nearly 29,000. Turkey in Asia gave us a foreign-born population in 1910 of almost 60,000, whereas 10 years before there was none enumerated by the census.

There is the possibility, yes, even the probability, that within the coming years these races, now comparatively strangers among our foreign-born population, may become as numerous in the United States as have those from Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Italy in the decade just closed.

In consequence immigration to the United States for the coming years promises to be in even greater volume than that of the past decade and more. The larger part of it—virtually all of it—will come from countries where the standard of living of the masses is very little, if any, above the mere cost of the coarsest subsistence. Unrestricted, this immigration will continue indefinitely until more of an equilibrium is established between the low economic rewards of toilers in those countries and the higher compensation to the workers in our own democratic society. This result can come about only through a slow and gradual process of economic adjustment. It will mean to our citizen workers a low wage and a low standard of living that are not in conformity with the proper development of a democratic society and republican institutions.

It means even more. It means that at this critical period it is imperative for us "as a people whose earlier hopes have been shocked by the hard blows of experience," to pause and take invoice "of the heterogeneous stocks of humanity that we have admitted to the management of our great political enterprise." Not only to pause and take invoice but also to examine carefully what it is that this immigration is doing to our democratic institutions. Do not the pitifully low wages paid in many of our industries and the physically injurious low standard of living of the workers in many of our industrial centers mean anything to you? Does not unemployment, such as was so shockingly in evidence in all our large cities the past winter, indicate to you that there is something wrong somewhere? Do not child labor, the industrial labor of women, the congestion of population, long hours of work, the rising death toll from preventable accidents and occupational diseases, the startling increase in poverty among our industrial classes, the discarding by our industries of men in their forties for the labor of the much younger immigrants—do not these raise up in your mind any relation to immigration? The fact is, there is a relation, a very close relation, between these social horrors and immigration.

There is one possible event that alone will stop this threatening inundation. This is restrictive legislation by the Congress approved by the President of the United States. These representatives of the American people can control the effects of those economic forces that otherwise are to give to us this increasing immigration of the future. Is not the present a most opportune time for such action? Should not we, as a people, stop at least a moment in our mad rush after mere wealth and take the time and exercise the forethought necessary to put our house in order so far as it is being disordered by immigration?

* * * * * * *

In the face of the facts should we not subordinate sympathy for the immigrant to that humanitarianism which holds that America's highest duty to mankind is to make the great experiment of an educated democracy the most triumphant success that can possibly be attained? Shall we permit sympathy for the immigrant to determine our decision as to the proper course we should take in our policy toward future immigration? By all means this great movement of peoples should be restricted by legislation within the narrow channel of the legitimate demand of our industries for unskilled labor. It should not be permitted any longer to rush in helter-skelter to flood our American industries with its cheap labor and our industrial centers with its low standard of living.

I now read some paragraphs from an article in the New Republic, published under date of October 9, 1915, at page 250:

This satisfying hypothesis of a lessening immigration has gained many adherents since the outbreak of war. Immigration has fallen off enormously. In 1915 there were but 326,700 newcomers as compared with 1,218,480, or over four times as many, in 1914. During the months of August, November, and December, 1914, and January, 1915, emigration actually exceeded immigration. It is even contended that these unusual conditions will persist after the war. The workers who otherwise might have migrated to America are being killed in battle. Moreover, when peace is declared Europe will have to be rebuilt, and those who would have filled the emigrant ships will be digging roads, repairing railways, restoring cities, and taking the places on farms and in the factories of the millions of soldiers killed or maimed. Wages in Europe will rise as the demand for labor increases, and instead of an excess of immigration we may actually find that the immigrants who return to Europe will outnumber those who arrive. If migration is being shut off in Europe, why erect barriers in America?

Unfortunately this automatic solving of our immigration difficulties is far from probable. Though dead men do not emigrate and maimed men who are incapacitated for self-support would be debarred, still the supply of able-bodied men and women willing to emigrate and admissible under our present laws has not appreciably diminished. The losses to the industrial population of the emigrating countries have been far less than the casualty lists suggest. After the war prisoners will be returned, while among the wounded the vast majority can be used in industry even though no longer available for warfare. The losses, though great, shrink when compared with the huge populations which furnish us our immigrants. Before the war Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Greece, Roumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, and Turkey had a combined population of almost 300,000,000, and it is safe to predict that their joint population will be considerably greater a few months after the conclusion of peace.

Italy's population, despite its huge emigration, grows continuously, and despite its emigration the Russian population increases by about 2,000,000 a year. We have only begun to touch the vast reservoirs of men in the Balkans, in Asiatic Turkey, in Persia. Unless all the populations of Europe and western Asia are absorbed in rapidly expanding national industries there will be millions of men to spare for American factories.

Such an immediate expansion of European industry, moreover, is not to be expected. The loss to capital in this way has been larger in proportion to the total capital of the countries than the loss of men to the total population. Much of this loss must be repaired before employment is again normal. The war has disorganized commerce and deflected international industry. Take Germany, for instance. After the war the foreign markets, which the Germans have so intelligently cultivated, will for a time be lost. The trade with South America, with the Orient, and with the nations with whom Germany has been at war, has been destroyed, and new banking, shipping, and general commercial relations can only slowly be reestablished. In the meantime the armies must be disbanded and both Germany and other countries must manage to reabsorb these millions into a crippled industry.

The economic transition from a peace to a war basis in the fall of 1914 was not effected without widespread unemployment and immense losses, and the return movement from a war to a peace economy will be even more difficult and costly. Industry can be readily contracted so as to disgorge a few million workers, but it can not always be rapidly extended so as to employ a few million men more. A similar problem, it is true, was solved by the Northern States in 1865, but in those days we had a vast unoccupied territory, and our industrial organization was simpler and less sensitive than that of Germany or of Great Britain to-day. The jobs of the men on the firing line have long since been filled; before industry reabsorbs these men, a long period of unemployment is likely to supervene.

Many soldiers will never be reemployed at all. They have lost their habitual acquiescence in the drudgery and monotony of continuous labor, and if they get new places will not hold them. The burden of the great struggle that has passed will weigh heavily upon the whole population. Taxes will be high, and the resulting rigid economy will still further limit industrial expansion. Though prediction is especially unsafe after the unpredictable events of this war, it seems highly probable that in all the belligerent countries real wages will be low, the cost of living high, unemployment widespread, and industrial discontent universal. An economic and moral pressure will drive men westward.

In the ravaged districts and in those communities which will have passed under the rule of a hostile nation the temptation to emigrate will be even greater. Men who have lost their farms and businesses, who have had their entire economic life disrupted, are of the very stuff of which emigrants are made, and the men of races which have been conquered will seek to escape from the alien rule by taking ship for America.

Whatever we do to meet this flood, whether we dam it, deflect it, or break it into smaller streams, we must at least face the real facts of the situation as it is likely to develop. It is not to be doubted that a large immigration suddenly poured upon us would have an evil effect upon all our social and industrial problems, upon pauperism, child labor, woman labor, low wages, long hours, industrial accidents and diseases, slums, sweating, the scrapping of older workmen, the dissolution of trade unions. It is not to be doubted that economic pressure in Europe means increased emigration to America. When the war closes, therefore, America is likely to face a new complication of our already perplexingly complicated problems and to be forced to essay a greater assimilation of aliens than ever at a moment when we should be working upon urgent problems of national reorganization.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer in the discussion of this matter, nor longer delay the passage of this important measure which is now before the Senate. I understand we are to vote upon it this afternoon, and I have no desire to delay it; but I think I have called attention to sufficient facts and to the opinions of those whose views are worthy to be considered, to show the importance of this immigration measure, not only to the immediate laborers of the country but to the entire community, the Republic as a whole.

If it should be determined in the future, by actual occurrences, that the situation is not so bad as contemplated, nor so imminent as it seems at this time, still there is abundant argument adduced heretofore many times, never answered, irrefutable, for the passage of the bill. Aside from the extraordinary conditions and the exceptional situation, there are the fundamental principles upon which the bill is based which have warranted its passage heretofore and ought to justify its consideration now. I have not gone back into those principles. I have thought it well to deal with what I conceive to be exceptional and imminent conditions. I am most profoundly impressed with the belief that the highest duty of this Congress is to meet them as effectively as it is within the power of faithful public servants to do. If we go away without doing so it will be shameless betrayal of a most serious and solemn obligation.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who sits near me, and who has advised me of the purpose of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], that there can be no possible way of preventing the passage of this measure if the Senator from South Carolina will make his motion and the Senators in this body who believe in this bill will cast their votes in accordance with their convictions. There is just one influence which can defeat this measure, and no other, and that is the caucus of the majority, which makes or unmakes legislation here. If you will take the grip of King Caucus off the consciences and convictions of the men who sit in this body, this transcendent measure will become the expression of this body before the session closes; and what I ask now, that it may be recorded in unmistakable terms, is whether this body is to legislate or whether the caucus is to strangle?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on the 10th day of August, in this Chamber, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], acting within his rights, incorporated in the RECORD a large number of petitions and memorials from various labor organizations throughout the United States. In my judgment, the Senator acted properly in including those petitions in the RECORD. I notice among them communications from many, if not most, of the States. I observe one from my own State, which I will read, addressed to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]:

ARIZONA STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Phoenix, Ariz., July 18, 1916.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am instructed in behalf of the Arizona State Federation of Labor to ask you to use all honorable means to bring about the enactment at this session of Congress of the immigration bill, H. R. 10384.

We understand that the above bill has been passed by the lower House, and it is feared that it may not be acted upon by the Senate at the present session.

Anything that you may be able to do toward bringing action on this bill at the present session will be considered a great favor by the labor movement of this State.

Thanking you, and with best wishes, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

THOS. A. FRENCH,
Secretary-Treasurer Arizona State Federation of Labor.

Mr. President, I know Mr. French; he is a reliable, intelligent, American citizen. Mr. French acted wisely in writing to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, because in my State as well as in other States the Senator is known as one of the most learned and courageous Senators in this body. So I am not surprised to find the labor organizations of my own State sending such petition to the Senator from Arkansas.

I was honored at the same time, and probably by the same mail, with a copy of the petition addressed to myself. But, Mr. President, the petitions which I have received on the subject of immigration were so numerous that I did not feel at liberty to include them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am sure they were in volume five or six if not a dozen times larger than the number of petitions the Senator from Arkansas included in the RECORD.

Upon consent being given to the Senator from Arkansas to include those petitions in the RECORD, I made, on page 12409, the following observation on that day:

Mr. President, I have received a large number of petitions, letters, and telegrams urging a vote on the immigration bill. I will not ask to have them included in the RECORD because of their great volume. They are all in favor of regulation of immigration.

I have observed a tendency on the part of the Senate on both sides to bring about some kind of an agreement whereby a final adjournment can be had.

If we postpone a vote on the immigration bill, the people of the United States will believe that, through expediency and shifting, we have dodged a vote on that bill. The Democratic Party is not cowardly; it is bold and courageous.

Therefore before any agreement looking to final adjournment is had, if no other Senator does, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill.

Now, Mr. President, it may be asked, Why am I in favor of the immigration bill?—should anybody in this Chamber deign to give any attention to my views. In answer I would say, first, Mr. President, I am for the bill because it is right; secondly, I am bound to vote for it so far as faith and honor can bind a man.

It is right, in my judgment, for many reasons. First, it imposes a literacy test. The immigrant must be able to read, not in the English language but in some language or dialect, 40 words. That is not drastic. It is, however, a screen—and however impractical it may be, it is the only screen we can set up—against the importation of ignorance. Whatever we may say, ignorance is neither a beautiful nor a desirable nor a laudable thing. A man or a woman over the age of 16 who is unable to read 40 words in some dialect or language is not the kind of immigrant we seek.

Is it drastic? Why, Mr. President, I point you to the statutes of Arizona. We do not think our law is drastic; I only quote the substance of the Arizona law.

Every citizen of the United States, male or female, of the age of 21 years or over, not prevented therefrom by some physical disability, such as blindness or being unable to use his hand, who is unable to read in the English language a section of the Constitution of the United States, and—not "or," but "and"—sign his or her name, is not permitted to vote, save and except, I believe, a few of the Mexicans, now very old men and women, who came in under the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden purchase treaty. So, in advocating the immigration bill and a literacy test therein I am only carrying out instructions from my own State which I would never dare to disregard.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest to him that the same situation exists in almost every other State in the Union, and that in one way or another a certain amount of education is required as a prerequisite to vote in almost every State in the Republic.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for that suggestion. I thought that the Arizona statute was rather unusual. I did not know there were over a dozen others; but I am very much gratified to know that.

Mr. President, so far as any bias or prejudice for or against any foreigner is concerned I have none. I have nothing at this time or any other time but large sympathy and charity for our distressed brethren in Europe, and I wish we could help them. But, Mr. President, I want for a moment to ask you to consider the situation that obtains in my State. We will take, for instance, the time when I was a candidate for the United States Senate some four years ago.

I would go to a town and register at a hotel. There would be a sign up, possibly in some mining camp, "English spoken here and at the post office." What did that mean? It means that nearly all, if not all, the miners in certain camps were foreigners. You would be advised where you would find English spoken. The American, the Scotsman, the Irishman, the Englishman, the Welshman, the German, the Hollander, the Frenchman, the Pomeranian, the Norwegian, the Austrian, the Swede, the Dane, the Belgian, and the other desirables—I could mention others—were very few. They could not compete with those laborers from southeastern Europe, who lived on 30 cents a day and who were willing to work 12 hours for a wage of $1.80 a day. Mr. President, as an American Senator I submit that it is too much of a handicap to ask an American laborer to compete with imported labor from countries that do not possess our ideals. The man who is willing to live on 30 cents a day and do hard manual work 12 hours a day for $1.80 is not the kind of man who will build up and strengthen this great Republic, the only first-class power where the flame of civilization burns brightly.

I am unable to perceive any force in the suggestion that this literacy test is "arbitrary." I confess that it is arbitrary. I wish I could design a better test. But, Mr. President, until the ingenuity of mankind or the beneficence of Providence shall give us the power to look into the brain and heart of an immigrant we shall be unable to design a better test than the literacy test.

In this world a person, outside of his impulses, his own thoughts, conscience, and inherent humanity, acquires extraneous information through two sources—his ears and his eyes. If he is unable to understand the English language when it is spoken to him, or if when a paper or book is presented to him he is unable to read and understand it in any language or dialect whatever, what avenues are left open so that he may mingle with the great body of citizens and become a useful citizen? How may we appeal to him?

But, say some, "Why, we are the melting pot." We are. I hope we shall always remain the melting pot, the haven of refuge of the oppressed. But when the metal does not melt, what about that? We ought to be the melting pot so long as the metal will melt. When it does not melt it is time to stop pouring more metal into the great vessel. We have reached the point now where the metal will not melt.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator if he thinks there are a large number of immigrants coming to this country now from abroad? Does the Senator feel that there are a great number now—such a number as to be a menace—coming from abroad?

Mr. ASHURST. I believe—and I investigated the matter very recently—that the immigration has in truth and in fact dropped off very materially within the past year. In fact, I doubt if it is one-fourth of what it was before the war began.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, the other question is, Does the Senator believe that that situation will materially change before December?

Mr. ASHURST. I fear it will, Mr. President. Now, I am not trying to speak in the language of prophecy. I may be wrong, but it is my honest conviction that if the European war should break up and dissolve—and it may break up, dissolve, and collapse as suddenly as it broke out—my judgment is that this Nation would be looked upon as the fair flower of all the countries. With peace, low taxes, good wages, liberty, salutary laws, and freedom from the dominating and crushing heel of militarism, the oppressed of Europe, almost all, would look toward this country, and our immigration would grow by leaps and bounds. Now, I may be wholly wrong. I do not quarrel with anybody who takes a different view, but that, at least, is my view.

Then, again, Mr. President, there is something about the conduct of Congress surrounding the proceedings on the immigration bill that does not exactly appeal to me. I decline to allow the immigration bill to be discussed from a political standpoint. This and the Sixty-third Congress passed a large number of laws that are most excellent, including some very good laws for labor. But, Mr. President, we must not forget that if we are to have true prosperity and true justice we must remember those who toil. It is unfair to remember everything else but labor and allow the gates of "Castle Garden to swing inward," as the saying used to be, "to admit foreign labor without restriction."

I think we ought to vote on the immigration bill before we adjourn. No amount of explanation, no amount of simulation, not all the waters of the ocean, will wash the conviction from the public mind, if we postpone the consideration of the immigration bill, that we have postponed it for a political reason.

I belong to a brave party. My party is not afraid of any contingency under the sun. You can call the roll now on every question that is before the American people, and the great, courageous Democratic Party will not shrink. It will say "aye" or "no." That is the kind of party I belong to. I do not like some of the suggestions that have come from the other side, especially from the speaker who immediately preceded me [Mr. BORAH], that there is some sinister designs to postpone this bill, some oblique political lines that are going to be drawn in order to postpone the consideration of this bill. No, Mr. President! There will be a vote on this bill before adjournment. Those who can not vote it down or vote it up may retire to the cloakrooms. Those who wish the bill passed will say "aye"; those who wish it defeated will say "no."

There has been something said about the "caucus." I am oblivious as to a caucus on this bill. Mayhap one was had. I do not say whether it was or not; but it would not make any difference to me, Mr. President, because I belong to that school of politics—happily not extinct—in which, when a man's word is given in a campaign, that is the end of it. In my campaign for United States Senator I went up and down the 113,000 square miles of Arizona a raging peripatetic volcano in constant eruption, pledging the people that every time and every place I had a chance to vote in behalf of American labor, and for protection for it against the hordes of southern European laborers pouring in here, I would do so. The caucus does not bother me. I am a man—a freeman. It is useless and idle to talk about caucuses controlling my vote on a matter regarding which I pledged my people. If I were not pledged to my people, then the solemn, deliberate judgment of our Democratic conference or caucus would have and should have the greatest weight with me.

Mr. President, as I said, I am not only following out my own convictions on the subject, but I am obeying the instructions. The legislature did not assemble and pass any bill on this subject in Arizona, but an initiative petition was signed and the question of the employment of aliens was put before the people. There was on the ballot a proposed law, which was in substance that no employer of labor in my State should employ more than 20 per cent aliens, and that the corporation or person employing persons must employ 80 per cent citizens of the United States.

In the campaign of 1914 I am sure I can say that question was the one the most lively discussed. It was discussed by all the speakers and by all the papers. The publicity pamphlets were especially clear in relation thereto, and it was adopted by a vote of the people nearly two to one.

Here was a law, I repeat, which required, under pains and penalties, all employers of labor to employ four American citizens out of every five employed. The bill went to the court, and the court struck it down. It went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court struck it down. Justice Hughes, I think, rendered the opinion. I am illustrating that I am obeying the instructions of my State on the subject. The expression of the people was the last expression and it was two to one in favor of the bill.

I do not want to be a leader. I think we have excellent leadership on our side. I believe our leadership on this side will give us a vote on the immigration bill. I think the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration will see to it that we get a vote. But, Mr. President, if no other recourse is left to me, if no other avenue is open whereby we may have a vote, I may be obliged before the Senate adjourns finally to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the immigration bill.

Now, Mr. President, one other word. They say our great coal companies, our great mining companies, and our great manufacturing establishments will be unable to operate unless they can secure cheap labor. The very statement of the proposition is sufficient to condemn it. It is said that our great coal mines, our metalliferous mines and mills, can not operate unless they get cheap labor. I will not even discuss such a statement; but I will say of the mine workers in Arizona that no more intelligent set of men ever walked the earth than the miners of Arizona. If you step into their lodge halls, you will find them discussing great questions. You will find them talking about fundamental questions. You will find that the miners in my State can stand up in a debate on almost any question before the American people to-day. They get good wages, and they earn them. They do not spend their substance in riotous living. They have libraries in their homes. I know many laboring men in my State who in the past 20 years have accumulated vast libraries and have snatched hours which might have been given to recreation, and have made themselves philosophers, made themselves familiar with the poetry, history, and the classics of this and other countries.

Do you tell me, then, I must not vote for a bill that affects them and that protects them. All they ask is that cheap, undesirable labor, which does not have the ideals they have, shall not be brought into competition with them.

I would rather have the metal remain in the earth and have the coal remain there than to consent to a proposition which would declare that we must send abroad and bring here labor from southeastern Europe to dig it out.

I repeat my advocacy of the immigration bill has no relation whatever to any prejudice against any race. I believe I am absolutely free from any and all racial prejudice.

The bill itself will admit what we are pleased to term desirable immigrants—the French, the Austrians, the Germans, the Belgians, Hollanders, and people from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, the English, Irish, Scotch, Welsh, and Canadians. The bill itself is so regulated as to act as a screen to keep out undesirable labor and to admit desirable immigrants. I mean by desirable immigrants those who have somewhat the same ideals of life, the same philosophy of life, the same love of liberty, and a sense of responsibility that the American people have.

I have been moved at this time to make these scattering and, to myself, insufficient remarks because of my ardent desire to see the bill pass. I hope the bill will pass. What other persons may do, whether they are officials charged with responsibility or not, never troubles me. My great desire is to live up to and meet my own responsibilities.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber only a few minutes ago, having been compelled to be out a short time on account of committee business. It seems there has been some discussion as to whether or not we shall have a vote on the immigration bill at this session. I wish to add to what has been said my very earnest declaration that we should have a vote on the immigration bill before the adjournment of the session. I am very emphatic and positive in that belief.

I am also strongly in favor of action at this session upon the Owen corrupt-practices act. I am very earnestly in favor of both those measures. I believe they are right, and my belief is that if a thing is right there is no better time to do it than the present time. If anything is right I believe in doing it now, not some other time. I do not believe in saying, "Well, this is right, but I will not do right now; I will do right at some other time; I will do right next December or some other time in the future."

I am not a believer in that doctrine. I do not believe it is a safe guide for legislative action any more than for individual action. If an individual believes that an individual act, or if a legislator believes that a legislative act, is right and ought to be done, there is no better time to do it than now; there is no justification for putting it off if it is right. Now is always the time to do the right. Never put off doing what is right.

I believe Congress ought to stay in session until we have redeemed our pledges to the people and have done what we believe to be right and in the interest of the people; and, so far as I am concerned, I shall act upon that belief. A political party can have no stronger claim upon the people than a record of redeeming all party pledges and doing the right at all times. Let us always be ready to do what we believe to be right and never favor postponing the doing of right. If you think the Burnett immigration bill is right, if you think the Owen corrupt-practices act is right, now is the right time to enact them; right now, at this session, so I say.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have voted for the immigration bill every time it has been before the Senate since I have been a Member of this body. I shall vote for it again when it comes up for consideration. I shall vote against taking it up at this session.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] is absent on official business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is detained at home on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, as I came into the Chamber a little while ago I heard two or three Senators discussing the question of taking up the immigration bill, and it occurred to me that I would like to add a word or two to what they said as to the necessity for taking that action.

I have been connected with the Committee on Immigration pretty much all the time since I entered the Senate, and for several years I was chairman of the committee. In 1907 I had the honor of presenting the bill which became the law and which is now upon the statute books. Down to that time I had not been in favor of an educational test. I had believed that this country was large enough and populous enough, that its resources were so broad, that we would be able to receive and assimilate all who might see fit to seek better conditions than they could enjoy in the old country.

But while that bill was pending in the Senate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered an amendment providing for an educational test, and after some debate it was adopted by quite a large majority and the bill went to the House. In the House it was not thought best to concur with the action of the Senate, but an amendment was adopted providing for an immigration commission whose duty it should be to study the whole question of immigration at home and abroad and report results to the Congress. To this amendment the Senate gave its concurrence, and as a result a commission was appointed in 1907, which consisted of three Members of this body, three Members of the House of Representatives, and three members from private life, appointed by the President of the United States. That commission immediately entered upon its duties and continued its work for about three years. During that time certain members of the commission visited every part of Europe and investigated the conditions of life there and the reasons which moved the citizens of different countries in Europe to seek an asylum in America. And every question connected with their lives in this country and their influence upon the social, industrial, and political conditions was fully investigated. The work covered a period of three years. I do not think it has been generally understood how thoroughly the commission entered into that work.

I had occasion two years ago to speak to the Senate, and I read very largely from the commission's report. We were very much criticized for the large expenditures of money found necessary in the work. As I now remember, the Government paid something over $700,000 for the work that was done and for the printing of the report. The reports, as I now remember, filled substantially 41 volumes of the standard size.

As a result of their inquiries the commission strongly recommended the adoption of the reading test as demanded by conditions then existing in the country and as purely a restrictive measure. They found at that time a very large oversupply of common labor in the country. They found that at the seat of the great basic industries there were substantially double the number of men upon the pay rolls than were required if all were to have steady employment; but one class were laid off to-day, another class to-morrow, but all were kept upon the rolls subject to emergency calls as the work fluctuated in amount. The result was that while the rate of wages paid to the employees when they had work was apparently satisfactory, the loss of time involved by this oversupply of unskilled labor was such that the average wage received by them was so small as to be un-American; that it was so small as to compel a condition of life which does not correspond to our institutions. So they recommended the reading test, with the purpose to reduce the flow of immigration of the particular classes of people to whom I have referred.

In this connection I may say that this was what we termed the new immigration. It was the immigration that was coming from Russia, Austria, Hungary, the Balkan States, and largely from southern Italy—in other words, the eastern and southern European immigration—which did not come as previous immigrants from western Europe had done, bringing their families with them and establishing homes, but the new immigration consisted very largely of men who were either unmarried or who, if married, had left their wives in the old country; they came seeking employment in the basic industries of the country, and substantially 75 per cent of them found labor at the seats of these industries or in the great cities.

Mr. President, it is not altogether because of the educational test that I agree with the gentlemen on the other side who have to-day urged that the immigration bill shall be passed at this session, but it is because that bill contains more than 100 amendments to the existing law, all of which have been pending since 1907 and which we have not been able to read into the existing law because of the vetoes by two different Presidents of bills substantially the same as the pending measure on the ground that it contained the educational test. In the consideration of the question of the educational test we have entirely overlooked the administrative features of the bill, and so from 1907 to the present time the law of that date has remained upon the statute books unchanged.

I have in my office a copy of the bill, to which I have attached notes. As I have already said, it contains more than 100 amendments to the existing law, which were recommended by the commission or which have been recommended by the Bureau of Immigration, growing out of or which have been suggested by the administration of the law. We need to strengthen several of the prominent features of the law in order to make it effective. We have the contract-labor law. That needs amendment. It may be a matter of surprise to the Senate to know that in spite of the need of amendments there have been collected in a single year fines aggregating nearly $80,000 growing out of violations of the contract-labor law, and yet that demands amendments to strengthen it.

I am free to speak in favor of present action, because I know my brethren on the other side of the Chamber are just as strongly in favor of the passage of this measure as I am. The votes of the Senate in the past indicate that fact; and I can conceive of no reason why the bill should not be taken up and passed during this session of Congress, unless it is that the President of the United States who vetoed it in the last Congress does not desire to again face a similar responsibility at this session of Congress. In the Sixty-second Congress, when President Taft was in office, this bill passed the Senate by a vote of 56 yeas to 9 nays. In the House the vote on the bill was 178 as against only 52 opposing it. President Taft vetoed the bill without giving his reasons as the Constitution requires, but in his message to Congress referred to reasons urged by Secretary Nagle in a letter to him, as the basis of his action. It is not my purpose this afternoon to examine those reasons. I examined them at the time and gave expression to my opinion of them in the Senate.

When the bill came back accompanied by President Taft's veto message and the question was, Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President? the Senate passed it by an overwhelming two-third majority over the veto, but it failed in the House because four or five men who favored the measure and would have voted to pass it over the veto happened on that day to be absent.

In the Sixty-third Congress the same bill was presented and it passed the House by a vote of 252 to 126, and in the Senate there was a vote of 50 in favor of the bill and only 7 votes against it.

That was returned to Congress by President Wilson with his veto. His veto was based almost wholly upon his objection to the literacy test—the reading test—of the bill. Briefly stated, his ground was that he could not believe the American people had ever adopted this policy, and he could not give his approval to the bill until the political parties or the people in some form had given an expression in favor of the bill. The Senate in that case, as in the other, voted to pass the bill over his veto, but it failed again in the House.

Two distinct Congresses have passed the bill—the Sixty-second and the Sixty-third. The Sixty-third Congress, that passed the bill during the present administration, was new; it was fresh from the people; it knew what the people wanted and what the people demanded.

In this, the Sixty-fourth, Congress we come again to consider it. There can be no question as to what the people demand. The vote in the House and the vote in the Senate indicate what they desire, and the time has come when no reason exists why this very meritorious bill should not be brought forward and adopted, and if the President sees fit to veto it again to have the voice of Congress express its judgment upon such action.

One of the reasons why I am insistent that action should be taken on this bill in the near future, and before adjournment, grows out of certain very remarkable conditions, to which I wish to draw the attention of the Senate.

In the census of 1900 there were found within our borders 900,000 foreign-born male whites 21 years of age or over who had taken no steps to become citizens of the United States and who, under our naturalization laws, were entitled to do so.

The census of 1910 disclosed the alarming fact that in that single decade the number of foreign-born males who were 21 years of age or over and who then had taken no steps to become citizens of the United States had increased from 900,000 to 2,600,000.

Mr. President, what does it mean to have in this country 2,600,000 alien-born men—I am not speaking of women or children—who, as late as 1910, had not taken a single step toward becoming American citizens, but who, under our naturalization laws, were substantially all entitled to become citizens of the United States? What does it mean to have 2,600,000 men who are aliens, who are liable to come into full citizenship almost immediately? Do you realize that this vast volume of male aliens amounts in number to one-seventh of all the votes cast in the presidential election of 1912? The possibilities suggested by the presence in this country of such a vast number of prospective, and to a large extent uneducated, voters can only be understood when I state that the entire presidential vote of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas in the election of 1912 amounted only to 2,280,000; and yet we had substantially that number of alien-born men in the United States on that date all ready to become citizens of the United States.

Is it wise and is it necessary that we should require of them that they be able to read in some language? Has not the time come when we ought to put that test into operation? Can we justify ourselves to the Nation if we let this session go by and do not strengthen the immigration laws?

I do not know what effect the close of the European war may have upon immigration. I am not worrying about that so much as I am about conditions in the United States when that war ends. It is a matter within the knowledge of every Senator present that just previous to the breaking out of the European war there was such an oversupply of common labor in this country that the soup houses were open in every city. That was only three years ago. I have not the figures before me, though I have them in my office, but it is a matter of common knowledge that men were idle in all our cities and distress existed everywhere.

The only reason that our laborers are now finding remunerative employment is because of the fact that our manufacturers are so largely given up to production of war munitions for Europe, in doing which they pay extraordinary wages and give employment to every man who will work. It is only, I say, because of that fact that we are not faced to-day, as we were three years ago, with vast hordes in our cities who need employment. When the war ends and the present demand upon our resources for munitions ceases, these men are compelled to return to the ordinary conditions of production, and they will have to face great changes with new and lower rates of wages. We shall have a surplus of labor in our cities with which we shall have to deal.

Referring to what we term new immigration, those coming since 1882 to work in our factories, let us inquire where they have gone and where can they be found. I find by referring to some papers which I have just discovered in my desk that during the period of 31 years, from 1883 to 1914, the new immigration, to which I have been referring, vastly exceeded in number all of the old immigration which had been coming to our country. I find that during those years we received almost 12,000,000 of what we call the "new immigration," members of which have come to this country to secure work in our manufactories, not to go into the West and to settle upon farms, as those who preceded them did, not to seek work as agricultural laborers, but who came in racial groups, who have moved in racial groups, and who have gone to the great centers of manufacturing, and who have found employment as common laborers.

I find also that substantially 75 per cent of this great male population—and it is mostly male—have gone to the cities of the United States. I remember it was suggested in this debate here at one time that the growth of the cities had been more from the country than from foreign sources, but the statement was not true. I find that the population of Chicago is 35.7 per cent foreign born and 40.8 per cent is foreign or mixed in parentage, while only 20.4 per cent is native born. I find that in Philadelphia the native born is only 37.7 of the whole; in St. Louis it is only 39.3 per cent; in Boston it is only 23.5 per cent; in Cleveland it is only 23.6 per cent; in Baltimore it is only 46.8 per cent; in Detroit it is only 24 per cent; in Buffalo it is 28.2 per cent; In Lowell, Mass., it is 19.5 per cent; in Paterson, N. J., it is 22.6 per cent; in Providence, R. I., it is 26.7 per cent; in Worcester, Mass., it is 28.4 per cent; in Rochester, N. Y., it is 34.2 per cent; while in Brockton, Mass., it is 40.5 per cent. Now, coming to Lawrence, where occurred the great strike a few years ago, I find that the native-born population of that city is only 13.6 per cent of the whole, while the native-born population of Waterbury, Conn., is 24.9 per cent.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Without in any sense combating the general trend of the Senator's argument, when he started to read the figures, as I recall, there were three groups, were there not, as to the source?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; there were. I have the table showing the number of foreign-born population in these cities, the number that were of mixed parentage—that is to say, cases in which the mother was foreign born and the father was native born or the reverse—and the absolutely native parentage.

Mr. CLAPP. Then the figures would not be entirely conclusive of the fact that this population came directly from foreign countries to the cities. It might have drifted in through the medium of a more or less temporary residence in the country. The Senator's figures are confined largely either to the great centers of foreign population, like Chicago, or to manufacturing cities.

I am satisfied that, especially in the West, the growth of the cities, and especially of the smaller towns, is overwhelmingly due to the tendency of the rural people to eventually drift into the cities; and while it is true as to the great centers of foreign population, like Chicago and New York, and true as to the industrial centers, that the construction which the Senator places on those figures might be put as to that population, I do not think it negatives the general proposition that in this country there is a terrific tendency, and I think a deplorable tendency, to go from the country to the towns and the cities.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota is entirely right when he refers to the country communities. The cities in such communities are not manufacturing cities. If I am correct in my recollection, New England showed an increase of a million in population during the decade prior to 1910, but it was mostly confined to the cities. There was a decrease of population in the rural sections. There was an exodus from the country to the large cities, and in many cases to the manufacturing cities. I was right, however, in the line of argument that I was making respecting the character of the increase in the manufacturing cities of the country, because all the statistics gathered by the Immigration Commission—and they were very exhaustive; they have been tabulated, and the percentages have been arranged—show that this great influx of immigration since 1882 has been induced by the tremendous development there has been in the United States in our manufacturing industries.

The truth is that the development of manufacturing industries in the United States since the Civil War, and particularly since 1880, has never been equaled in any nation of the world. Some of us smiled when Bismarck made his prophecy, that under our policies the United States would pass Europe at a canter in the production of manufactured goods; but we did so away back in 1890. To-day I suppose that we are producing $20,000,000,000 of manufactured articles, more by far than were produced in England, Germany, and France combined even before the European war broke out. It is to meet the demand for labor caused by this remarkable development of our industries that this influx of common labor has come from eastern and southern Europe.

These men are not objectionable; they are rugged, honest, frugal, industrious men, who have come here because in the old countries they were securing only the smallest wage possible. I remember when I was in Italy investigating immigration matters there I was told by those in authority that down to the great exodus of Italian laborers to the United States the farm laborers in that country were geting only 25 cents a day for their labor; but owing to the large number emigrating from Italy to the United States the rate of wage had increased, and they were exulting in the fact that their farm laborers were getting 40 cents a day for their labor.

Mr. President, again referring to the matter concerning which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] was interested, I have found some statistics which throw light upon it. It appears from the census of 1910 that during the 10 preceding years the increase in the native white population of New York was 30 per cent, while the increase in the foreign-born population of that city was 52.9 per cent. New York is a type of the commercial, manufacturing, and productive cities of the country. In Chicago I find that the native white population increased 25.5 per cent, while the foreign-born population increased 33.4 per cent; in Philadelphia the native white population increased 15.5 per cent, and the foreign-born population 30.3 per cent; in St. Louis the increase in the native white was 20.6 per cent, while that in the foreign-born was 13.3; in Boston the increase in the native white population was 17.5, while that in the foreign-born population was 23.5 per cent; in Cleveland the increase in the native white population was 41.7 per cent, while that in the foreign born was 57.4 per cent; in Baltimore the increase in the native white population was 9.7 per cent, and 13.4 per cent in the foreign-born white; in Pittsburgh the increase in the first class was 16.3 per cent, while in the foreign-born white it was 22.7 per cent; in Detroit the increase in the native white was 63.5, and in the foreign-born white 63 per cent; while in Buffalo the increase in the native white was 23 per cent, and in the foreign-born white it was 13.1 per cent. So that it appears from this table that a very large proportion of the increase of population in all of the manufacturing towns of America has been made up of this influx of rugged, hardy, earnest, common laborers from eastern and southern Europe, who have gone directly to the seats of the great basic industries, where they are living under conditions which the commission found were deplorable.

They are a thrifty class, but, unfortunately, they have largely come without families. They are largely composed of men who are living singly, whether married or unmarried; and that being the case, they adopt methods of living that fail to bring them into touch with the other elements of the community in which they live.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I confess I never looked at the immigration bill with reference to the inquiry I am about to make. The remarks of the Senator are very interesting, and I desire to ask him would the pending immigration bill in any way change the condition as to these men coming by themselves instead of bringing their families with them?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think it would, in this way: From this oversupply of common or unskilled labor the inevitable result has been a low rate of wage, and if the Senator will permit me, I will give him an illustration of the operation of it in the iron and steel industry.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me first, he is discussing this bill as I have never heard it discussed before; and his long experience in connection with the subject, to me at least, makes his presentation most interesting. So I trust he will pardon the interruptions in which I have indulged.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt me. I was hoping that the Senator was about to propound another inquiry.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I will wait until the Senator further develops the subject.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I find that in their exhaustive investigation of the iron and steel industries the commission's agents came in contact with 86,000 individuals. I may say that in the work of the commission we issued cards containing inquiries that would cover all of the facts which we wished to ascertain. I am glad to say also that the great corporations of the country cooperated with us, in some instances circulating the cards themselves and aiding us to get replies to them upon a promise on our part that we would give them the result of what we discovered, which we did.

In the case of the iron and steel industry, I repeat our agents came in contact with 86,000 individuals. Of this number 57.7 per cent were foreign born, while 13.4 per cent were their sons; so that 71.1 per cent of all the employees with whom the commission came in contact were either born abroad or were the children of those born abroad. We found that the average weekly wages paid to the men were not a subject of complaint. They amounted to $14.75 per week; and, had the men had constant employment during the year, they would have received upon an average $750 as the result of the year's work, but, as a matter of fact, we found that the 86,000 men averaged to receive only $326 a year, instead of $750, which they would have received had they been able to work full time. Three hundred and twenty-six dollar a year! Think of it, in these great cities! It indicated that they had secured employment only one-half the time upon the average. This condition resulted from the fact, to which I have already alluded, that there was not work at that time in the steel industry for the large number of men who were on the pay roll; and so, perhaps, they would work one set of men this week and another set of men next week, and keep them employed alternately; so that in the end the men averaged or received but $326 annually for their work, when, if there had not been an oversupply of common labor, but just the number required, they would have received $750 annually, instead of $326.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the fact that under the pending bill there would be a lessened supply or an increased demand in proportion to the lessened supply would be the only feature in the bill that would tend to change the present condition of so many of these men coming here singly without their families?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the number of those coming to the country should be reasonably reduced it would give a better opportunity to those who are here. Those who are receiving the low rate of wage, to which I have referred, were compelled to live in racial groups, and, being very largely men, they made up a male colony. We found that they had boarding clubs, 15 or 20 men forming a club; they would have a commissary and live there just as single men under such conditions would live.

We all know that in this country our common schools are the greatest agency employed in assimilating the foreign element. Let the child of foreign-born parentage go into any community and enter the public school, he is in a week or 10 days' time in perfect touch with all the pupils of the school, and it is only a question of a short time when the parents become acquainted; in other words, under such conditions the foreign-born population are no longer so many labor units, but they become real residents of the place, and the people of the place take an interest in them; but, living as these single men do in these great centers, they do not come in touch with church, with school, with society, or with any other assimilating influence; they live with those of their own race; they speak their own language; they eat their own varieties of food, and live isolated lives. That is not a good way to make American citizens.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, when was this investigation made to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. These figures were compiled in 1909. I have referred to the iron and steel industry merely as an illustration of what the conditions were found to be in other industries in the country.

The reason that the Immigration Commission selected the educational test was that various tests were suggested. I do not know how many people recommended increasing the head tax as a bar to the admission of aliens, but that, if done at all, should be done cautiously. It is fully high enough now; in fact, it is too high, in my judgment. What we want in this country is an immigration of families—men who bring their wives and children with them. Those classes that make good American citizens; they are easily assimilated; they are soon inspired with American instincts and enterprise and energy. Those were the classes we were getting before 1882. Think of the character of that great English, Irish, German, and Scandinavian immigration that came to us prior to 1882. It was that immigration that helped us to open and build up the West; it was that immigration that enabled us to construct our vast system of railroads, a system that connects the two oceans and surpasses in mileage the systems of continental Europe.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. Then there is another thought that one can evolve from this discussion. It is poor political economy to permit men to come here in competition with our labor and not bring with them their families, which would go to make a home market for the product of the labor.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That was precisely the thought that the Immigration Commission had in mind when this report was made. The commission said:

As a result of the investigation the commission is unanimously of the opinion that in framing legislation emphasis should be laid upon the following principles:

1. While the American people, as in the past, welcome the oppressed of other lands, care should be taken that immigration be such both in quality and quantity as not to make too difficult the process of assimilation.

2. Since the existing law and further special legislation recommended in this report deal with the physically and morally unfit, further general legislation concerning the admission of aliens should be based primarily upon economic or business considerations touching the prosperity and economic well-being of our people.

That, I think, was the Senator's thought, and this is very important, I think.

3. The measure of the rational, healthy development of a country is not the extent of its investment of capital, its outputs of products, or its exports and imports, unless there is a corresponding economic opportunity afforded to the citizen dependent upon employment for his material, mental, and moral development.

4. The development of business may be brought about by means which lower the standard of living of the wage earners. A slow expansion of industry which would permit the adaptation and assimilation of the incoming labor supply is preferable to a very rapid industrial expansion which results in the immigration of laborers of low standards and efficiency, who imperil the American standard of wages and conditions of employment.

The commission agrees that:

1. To protect the United States more effectively against the immigration of criminal and certain other debarred classes—

(a) Aliens convicted of serious crimes within a period of five years after admission should be deported in accordance with the provisions of House bill 20980, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

(b) Under the provisions of section 39 of the immigration act of February 20, 1907, the President should appoint commissioners to make arrangements with such countries as have adequate police records to supply emigrants with copies of such records, and that thereafter immigrants from such countries should be admitted to the United States only upon the production of proper certificates, showing the absence of convictions for excludable crimes.

I will not read everything that the commission said, because it is too long; but I think that answers the Senator's inquiry as to the economic questions involved.

Now, coming to the question why the educational test was suggested, I was saying, when the Senator interrupted me, that we ought not to increase the head tax to an undue amount, because these immigrants who come here are all poor—unmistakably poor, all of them—and when a man comes here with a wife and five children and the head tax is placed upon each one of them, it has a debarring influence and one which discourages the man of family and encourages the single man to come. It is bad policy to adopt any amendment that will prevent the married man from bringing his wife and children with him. So when we had looked this matter all over we became perfectly satisfied that among all the methods suggested the educational test as a purely restrictive measure, one that would decrease the flow of this class of immigration, was the most practicable one of all; and we reached that conclusion in this way:

We took the nations from which this immigration comes so largely, the eastern and southern nations of Europe, and ascertained what the literacy percentage was among the people of those nations. We saw at once that if we adopted the educational test, it would substantially decrease the volume of that stream 30 per cent, which was just about what we wanted to accomplish. On the other hand, the educational test would in no way affect England or Scotland or Ireland or the Scandinavian countries or Germany or France. The degree of illiteracy in those countries is negligible, while, on the other hand, in southern Italy 54 per cent of the immigration class are unable to read or write. In northern Italy, under the same Government but under entirely different conditions, less than 10 per cent are illiterate. It is a commercial, manufacturing, trading section of Italy, while the other is not. Then as you go through the Balkan States and north to Russia the different degrees of illiteracy are such that the average of all is probably about 30 per cent. So we adopted the reading test simply as a practical method of reducing the stream of that particular immigration that was crowding to our cities and living under the conditions I have described and seeking work in these large and rapidly growing industries.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, has the Senator any figures which give approximately the proportion of the entire immigration that would probably be excluded on account of the insertion of the literacy test?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think I quite caught the question.

Mr. CLAPP. I say, has the Senator any figures that would approximately give the percentage by which the entire immigration would be lessened on account of the literacy test? The Senator gives 30 per cent. As I understand, that 30 per cent is limited to certain areas.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I may state that our estimate was that it would reduce the general immigration 30 per cent. It would not very much affect western Europe, from which we received those first splendid bodies of people that have done so much to upbuild our country.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but I did not understand that the 30 per cent applied to the entire immigration.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was probably careless in my statement. I do not know but that I may find among my papers something that will throw light on that.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not know whether the Senator made that statement in reference to the entire immigration or in reference to certain areas from which immigration comes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think I will be able, if the Senator will bear with me, to give him just what he wants. I will say to the Senator that in a bill which I introduced I incorporated a clause for restricting the number of immigrants coming to this country, under which the number admitted from each nation would depend upon the number from that nation in this country at the last census. For instance, we know by the census of 1910 the number of every nationality then residing in this country.

I incorporated that provision that Congress might be considering it, because at some time I think we shall adopt that as a basis. We want to reach the Asiatic nations and do away with the Japanese irritation, and I think if we put all Asia upon the same plane that Europe is placed on under our laws, then there will be no cause whatever for irritation, and that through the percentage system we may be able, perhaps, to solve some of our very serious problems. But I did not introduce it with the purpose of pressing it at this time as against the educational test.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that is a very interesting suggestion. I should like to suggest to the Senator whether, in view of the very large population already here from many foreign countries, it would be anything like an equitable distribution in view of the very small population that is here from other foreign countries? Would it solve the oriental question, unless you had two rules?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It might not solve it to the satisfaction of those nations. It would solve the Asiatic question, I think, to the satisfaction of the Pacific coast more nearly, perhaps, than the rest of the Nation. But the Senator wanted to know how the general proposition might affect the nations of the two classes coming from Europe. It would very largely affect eastern and southern Europe, but would hardly affect the other nations—that is to say, England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Scandinavian countries, and Germany—at all, because the children are all educated in those countries, while that is not the case in eastern and southern Europe.

I will not further the percentage plan as to which the Senator inquires.

I repeat that while in the beginning I was not in favor of the educational test, investigation convinced me that we ought to adopt a restrictive measure in this country; and having become so convinced, I am satisfied that the educational test, the reading test, is the most feasible one; that it will apply just where we want to have it apply, namely, to the nations from which these men come who are now, or were in 1909, working for $326 a year, mostly congregating in the cities.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I understand that the Senator does not want to go into the question of the percentages particularly, but I am very much interested in that branch of the subject. Dr. Gulick, as the Senator knows, has investigated and written a good deal on that subject.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Dr. Gulick took his idea from this proposition.

Mr. WORKS. And I have had some articles written by him printed in pamphlet form.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have been in constant communication with him, and he caught his idea from this proposed amendment.

Mr. WORKS. I was wondering how the percentage or the number of immigrants to be admitted from each of the countries in a general way is determined. Is it determined by the home population?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is determined upon the number of each nationality in the United States according to the last census. We know the number of each nationality here in 1910. Now, if we say that only 10 per cent of each nationality here in 1910 shall be allowed to come in during each succeeding year until the next census, the matter is determined.

Mr. WORKS. That was what I wanted to be informed about. I wondered if it was based upon the home population of these different countries, because then it would be an enormous task to determine that question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Oh, no. It is based on the number in this country. I do not find the statistics regarding the Asiatic immigration, because that is not included in this bill. Dr. Gulick's idea is that we should modify the percentage plan that I suggested a year or two ago and apply it to Asia as well as to Europe and perhaps reduce the percentage from 10 per cent to 5, or to any basis that may be agreed upon; he thinks it will solve the Japanese problem, because now he believes that the irritation in that country comes from the fact that we have discriminated against them by name.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator is certainly delivering a very interesting address; and I note that he has referred on two or three different occasions to the number of foreign-born people that were in this country at different times. I am interested to know what that proportion was in 1910, as nearly as the Senator is able to tell. I think he has the figures before him, from the way he has discussed the matter; and I should like to know, if the Senator can give us the information, just about what the proportion of the foreign-born population was when the last census was taken, in 1910?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think I have it in my desk. I did not expect to speak this afternoon, and I brought no papers in with me. All that I have before me I found in my desk, and I have been quoting pretty largely from an old speech that I found here which I made last year, which was full of facts.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator must have found some very important papers, for he has certainly given us some very valuable information.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But I doubt whether I have the papers that will give the proportion of foreign-born residents of the United States in 1910, or the proportion as between them and the native born.

Mr. BRADY. At some future time I should be very glad if the Senator would have them placed in the RECORD.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be glad to look that matter up.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator's knowledge on this question is such that I know that he can give us some figures that will be valuable.

There is another question I should like to ask the Senator, and that is relative to the percentage of foreign population that he found in the different towns. He has mentioned it in his address to-day. I understood him to say that it averaged from 13 to 46 per cent.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Does the Senator refer to the literacy test? Is he speaking of those who can read and write?

Mr. BRADY. Yes. I understood the Senator to say that it ran from 13 to 46 per cent, and I did not hear the Senator say, in any instance, that it would run over 50 per cent; and I am interested to know——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In the case of southern Italy I think it is 54 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. I am interested to know about what the average was. Did the Senator ever have figured the average of the entire cities and parts of the country that he investigated?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I doubt whether I have that in the form in which the Senator puts it. If the Senator will allow me, I will look for a moment, and I may be able to find what he wants.

I think I have here something upon that question. I find among my papers a table giving the relative degree of illiteracy of the old and the new immigration during the period of 11 years from 1899 to 1909. During that time we admitted 7,199,060 immigrants, and of these 1,983,618 were of the old type, coming from western Europe, and the percentage of illiterates in that class was only 2.7 per cent. That would cover England and Scotland and Ireland and Germany and France and the Scandinavian countries.

Mr. BRADY. What is the percentage?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The percentage of those who are unable to read——

Mr. BRADY. That came to this country?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of those who came to this country from western Europe the illiterates constituted only 2.7 per cent. On the other hand we received of what we term the "new immigration"—those coming from Russia, Austria-Hungary, the Balkan States, and Italy—5,215,442, and the percentage of illiterates among them was 35.6 per cent.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I understood the Senator to say that the question of oriental immigration was not involved in this bill. Am I right about that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator is right.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that, so far as it applies to Japan. Of course the immigration from China is controlled by the exclusion act.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is what I had in mind. Chinese immigration is controlled by the act to which the Senator refers.

Mr. WORKS. That, however, does not apply to the Japanese.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No.

Mr. WORKS. And this bill does apply to Japanese immigration.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. This bill does apply to the Japanese; yes; but this bill as it is reported to the Senate does not contain the percentage clause.

Mr. WORKS. No.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That was a scheme which I presented two years ago; but because of the attachment of the country to the literacy test, I have not wanted to push it as against that. I should be glad to put them both into the bill. I thank the Senator for correcting my statement, which was an inadvertence. I am glad also to have had my attention called to this question of the relative percentage of illiterates in the different countries, because it enables me now to give them for each of the countries, if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] would like them.

Mr. BRADY. I should like them very much.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. During the period of 11 years, 1899–1909, we admitted 7,199,060 aliens over 14 years of age. Of the Scandinavians, only four-tenths of 1 per cent were illiterate; of the Scotch only seven-tenths of 1 per cent; of the English only 1.1 per cent; of the Welsh only 2 per cent; of the Irish only 2.7 per cent; of the Dutch 4.7 per cent; of the Germans 5.4 per cent; of the French 5.4 per cent. Those countries represent the "old immigration." In the countries representing the "new immigration" the degree of illiteracy was as follows: Southern Italy, 54.2 per cent; Polish, 35.4 per cent; Hebrew, 25.7 per cent; Slovak, 24.6 per cent; northern Italy, 11.8 per cent; Hungarian, 11.4 per cent; Croatians and Slovenians, 36.4 per cent; Magyars, 11.4 per cent; and Russians, 34.7 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. And after studying the question thoroughly, the commission, as I understand, concluded that one way to eliminate that undesirable element was by putting in the educational test?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Just precisely that; and the reason is presented in this table that I have given. Now, our great immigration prior to 1882 came almost wholly from western Europe, where the percentage of illiteracy is only from four-tenths of 1 per cent up to 5.4 per cent; but since the establishment of our manufactures in this country, which by 1880 had become established——

Mr. BRADY. There has been a gradual increase of the undesirable immigrants?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Well, we call them undesirable simply because they have come in too large numbers. I do not say anything against the character of these men. They are most of them day laborers in the old country—farm laborers—and they are honest and thrifty and industrious. They want to do the right thing. They have come here to better their condition, but they have not brought their families. They have not gone to the farms, but they have sought the great centers of population.

Mr. BRADY. And necessarily take a job away from some American citizen?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And necessarily take a job away from somebody else, as I showed in the case of the steel industry, where they were not earning over 50 per cent of the prevailing rate of wages, because they could not have work all the time.

Mr. BRADY. And if I understood the Senator correctly relative to the conditions in the steel industry, he made the statement that the wages seemed to be satisfactory; that it was a question of hours of employment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; of days of employment.

Mr. BRADY. In other words, there is no fault to find with the wage scale?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No.

Mr. BRADY. But rather with the lack of opportunity to work?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They were getting between seven and eight hundred dollars a year, provided they had work all the time.

Mr. BRADY. But, as a matter of fact——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But, as a matter of fact, they had so little work that the average compensation received by them in 1909 was, as I remember—I have already stated it—$320 a year.

Mr. BRADY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. BRADY. I do not want to interrupt him in any manner that will take him away from the line of discussion he has intended to follow; but before he takes his seat I should like very much to have him explain something relative to the different amendments that have been made to this bill. My reason for asking this question is that, if I understand the Senator correctly, the educational test is just one factor in this bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Only one factor.

Mr. BRADY. Aside from that, which means very much to the citizens of America in relation to the immigration that is admitted to our country, what other really beneficial provisions are in this bill that should not be permitted to go over from this session without being enacted into law?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. As I said in the opening, substantially 100 amendments were proposed to the existing law, and probably 50 of them are important. It will be impossible for me, without any papers before me, to take them up individually, because they are matters that were largely discovered by the commission as needing amendment, but they are more largely questions that have arisen in the administration of the law, and result from the evasions of the law and from the decisions of the courts.

Mr. BRADY. And they were placed in the bill for the purpose of strengthening and bettering the law?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. For the purpose of strengthening the law and making it a stronger and more resistant law.

Mr. BRADY. I am certainly heartily in accord with the position the Senator takes on this question; and every question that I have asked has been with the thought of securing more informaion, with the desire of impressing upon the Senate the necessity of passing this bill at the present session.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. COLT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If this supply should be cut off would there be enough labor in the country to meet the demands of business, referring particularly to manufacturing business, in normally prosperous times? Now, the Senator concedes that this class of immigrants are not undesirable.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. COLT. In other words, he corrected some Senator using this term.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They are not undesirable as raw material, if the Senator will allow me; but coming as they do, under the conditions they do, and as we found them in 1909, we found great difficulty in assimilating them.

Mr. COLT. I admit that this is the important fact which enters into this problem. I was some 30 years on the bench and in the earlier years I had a great deal to do with naturalization, and I am naturally opposed to the literacy test as a test of character and good citizenship.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is not recommended by the commission on that ground.

Mr. COLT. Then it was not adopted because it was a meritorious test, but as the best test that could be devised to accomplish the desired end?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It was to diminish the flow of that particular class of immigrants.

Mr. COLT. Do you think, looking at the best interests of the country, that it would be well to diminish this flow?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We are having no flow at the present time.

Mr. COLT. I know we are not; but has this country, speaking of normal times, reached a stage of population where it would be well to diminish the flow of immigration?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think so, clearly. I am very strongly convinced of it.

Mr. COLT. It certainly seems to me to be a debatable proposition.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was not of that opinion before I made that investigation, I will say to the Senator, but the conditions of three years ago, if the Senator pleases, developed that fact. We had a large surplus of labor in all the cities of the United States, and it was a matter of great apprehension what we were going to do with it. It was only the fact that they had entered extensively into the manufacture of munitions for foreign nations that the labor has been so fully employed.

Mr. COLT. But would you not say that was an abnormal condition?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Let me give the Senator——

Mr. COLT. I was referring rather to normal times, and I wanted to ask the Senator whether in normal times of business in the United States, growing as rapidly as we are, he had reached the conclusion that we ought to limit immigration?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In the year 1909 we thought that was normal. That is when this investigation was made. I might go through the whole list of the great basic industries. I have given the iron and steel industry. I could give you what it was in all the other industries. We found a great surplus of common labor unemployed. Coming down to the beginning of the present administration, we find there had been a general growth in the manufactures. But we did not find that the general condition, so far as we were able to inquire, had been materially changed.

Then followed the tariff legislation under which we are now living. I think and, from observation, I believe that the effect of that legislation so far as New England and the manufacturing sections of the country are concerned was disastrous. I think it has diminished the amount of manufacturing. I have in my mind an institution in Vermont which produced cream separators. It employed at times four or five hundred men. Under existing law cream separators are now largely supplied by the Scandinavian States. As a consequence, the business I mentioned was pretty nearly destroyed by the time the European war broke out. When that came the owners, to save themselves, entered into contracts to manufacture war material for foreign Governments, and their shops are now running days and nights with a full compliment of men. I take that as an illustration on which I base my opinion. I think a large number of manufacturers will suffer from collapse in their industries.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Does not the fact that an adequate number of laboring men have been secured under the conditions as they exist now establish the fact that we had too many under normal conditions—that there was a surplus?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think there can be any question about that. I am morally certain of it. It is because of that it would seem to me the bill ought to be considered at this session of Congress and not be again postponed.

I do not apprehend that the European war will last forever, and I am looking forward to the time when we shall meet conditions which are normal—that is, normal under the system which has been inaugurated and which is in operation. I expect the time is coming in the not distant future when we shall again find a surplus of common labor in this country, and I think we ought to restrict in a reasonable degree the flow of immigration from Europe until we find where we are.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to state to the Senator that I have voted for three immigration bills that have been vetoed, and they all contained the literacy test. I was not quite satisfied that that was a proper rule to follow, but after all it was the best rule we could get to limit immigration. The trouble with immigration in recent years has been this: The earlier immigration that we got came from the British Islands, Germany, and the Scandinavian countries, and that immigration, instead of huddling in the big cities and industrial centers along the seaboard, hiked to the West and occupied and took up and settled our unimproved land, and the immigrants became in a short time farmers and industrial producers; they became, in fact, capital and labor united in one person.

The immigration in recent years has been of a different kind. Most of the immigrants have come in recent years from southern Europe. Many of those people are good people. I have seen them and they are good people; but the trouble with them is they will settle in the big cities, in the manufacturing centers, and overcrowd those instead of going to the westward and settling and taking up land and improving the country like the earlier generation of immigrants.

It has occurred to me that we do need a certain class of laborers in this country. Take the men who work on our streets, who dig our tunnels, and do our underground work, if you look at them and study them they are thrifty, industrious people, and they perform a class of labor that our ordinary American laborers do not want to do.

For instance, we see on the streets of this city Italians working side by side with colored people on street work. That is something that you do not ordinarily find. The question is, Where are we to get the supply of that kind of labor if you cut it off entirely? Our own people have got, to some extent, above it. They do not like to engage in that work. This literacy test will cut off that kind of labor, and that is the question that is troubling me a good deal. I shall vote for this bill, but still I am not free from doubt on the subject.

Another question has troubled me, and it is this: Uneducated men come here, and many of them can not read and write, but they are very thrifty and very industrious, and, as a rule, they are temperate. If you notice what has taken place within recent times, you will find that they have not raised any question about their interest in this or any foreign country. We oftentimes get among those who can read and write, men of college education, poor wrecks of humanity who come here. I have known from the Scandinavian countries a great many university and college graduates who had become sots and worthless in their own country who have come here. They are sent oftentimes by their relatives. They can pass the literacy test easy enough; many of them can read and write in two or three foreign languages; and yet to my mind they are the most undesirable class of immigrants we get. I have seen some of the university graduates from the Scandinavian countries who plumed themselves upon having a degree from the University of Copenhagen, Stockholm, or Christiania, and they came over here, and they are utterly worthless; they are no good to this country. Yet there is another class who come over here not from the Scandinavian countries. There they can all read and write.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. He was out when I was giving the degree of illiteracy in the different countries. I want to call his attention to the fact that illiteracy is lower in the Scandinavian States than in any other countries of Europe. It is only four-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. NELSON. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I state it because the Senator is such a distinguished representative of one of those States.

Mr. NELSON. But while this literacy test will admit practically everyone of sound body and sound mind from those countries, yet the law admits a good many worthless subjects at times. Take the countries of southern Europe, where they have been unfortunate, where they have been oppressed for generations and have not had the opportunity of good government. They hardly know what a government is in the sense that we understand it. Those people come here with the intention of earning an honest living. Many of them can not read and write, yet the bulk of those people occupy a place here in our labor market that is hard to fill under present conditions, and has been, except those, for instance, who go into the sweatshops of New York. Take the people who work on our streets and do our tunnel work and all that kind of hard underground work, we would miss them. If we sent them out of the country we would have great difficulty in supplying their places.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. May I suggest at this point that the Senator was absent from his seat when I covered the very ground that he is going over at this time? I stated in his absence that the estimate made by the Immigration Commission was that the reading test if put in operation might perhaps reduce the general immigration substantially 30 per cent, but we have been getting a million and a million and a quarter of that kind of men every year. They have overcrowded our cities, overcrowded the labor market, and even with 30 per cent cut off there would be a good chance that we would have an abundant supply for all the purposes to which the Senator is referring.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator must understand me. I can very well see the difficulty of laying down a hard and fast rule in this manner. It is very difficult to lay down a general rule that would work equitably and fairly, and perhaps this comes the nearest of any rule that can be advanced in the case. Yet after all I have grave doubts, if you strictly enforce it, whether in time it will not lead to a lack in that class of labor into which our American people as a general rule will not go. I can recollect when I was a boy in Wisconsin the work on the railroads was commonly done by the Irish. The Irish did that work a great many years ago and then they quit. Then they were followed by Swedes and Norwegians, and they quit it; and now in our country out in the West the building of railroads and the reconstruction of railroads is all done by another class of people. It is done mostly by immigrants from southern Europe, and neither the Irish nor the Germans nor the Scandinavians care about doing that kind of work. They look upon it as drudgery. They would rather make their living in any other way.

One unfortunate thing in the situation has occurred in our great commercial centers. There you find in certain trades and occupations, for instance, in the manufacture of all kinds of clothing there has been a rush from southern Russia and from the Balkan States of a lot of immigrants who, instead of going West and starting in with communities there, where their labor is needed, where they could become independent, have settled down in large cities and have actually congested the supply of labor engaged, for instance, in the manufacture of clothing. Hence we have those sweatshops and we have strikes such as we have recently had there, because it is overcrowded.

I have always thought that our immigrant legislation should be supplemented by a bureau, an attachment you might call it, by which, when these immigrants come in, they should be taken in hand and moved westward, where there is some space and where there is great need of help, and not allow them to remain and become congested in the large cities and industrial centers. If we want to avoid that condition we have got to do something.

Yet I am greatly embarrassed. I wish we could lay down a rule by which we could exclude some of these educated tramps—tramps who are filled with socialism, who are quasi anarchists, and who come here to exploit the Government of the United States. I wish we could get some law to exclude them. I remember very well in the days of Populism, if the Senator will excuse me for taking up the time, when Populism was rampant in our country, we had a lot of immigrants who had just come over from different parts of northern Europe. They all joined the Populist Party. They would not be Democrats, they would not be Republicans, and they joined that new party. They were going to reform the United States, and they were the wildest sort of people I ever saw. I was the only one in that part of the country who told them the truth. I said to them, "You people have come over here to teach us how to govern the United States. Neither the old Democratic Party nor the Republican Party is good enough for you. You are going to organize a party of your own to run this Government. Do you think you can do it? In the next place, if you are not satisfied with this country and this Government and the conditions here, you had better go back to the old country and reform that before you try to reform us."

Mr. WORKS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Very gladly.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator from Minnesota has overlooked one of the important phases of this question of foreign labor. He says that the American laborer no longer desires to do a certain class of work, because it is drudgery. My own opinion about it is that American labor has been crowded out of those positions by foreigners, and that there has been a tendency on account of the kind of immigration we have had in this country to degrade labor so that the American naturally desires to get out of that sort of work and leave it to the foreigner, who will work under conditions that American labor will not submit to. That seems to be one of the serious phases of the question that the Senator did not mention.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from California had been a Minnesota farmer like myself, he would have hardly come to that conclusion. The strange thing was—and it seemed to me remarkable—that during all the years when the flood tide of immigration was so big, when it ran from 800,000 to a million a year, it was more difficult to get farm laborers in Minnesota than at any time before. I think they are no scarcer to-day than they were then. It seems to me extraordinary what became of all that immigration. We could not get any of it there; labor became scarcer and wages higher. Though our wages became higher and higher, we could not get any of that kind of immigration. They did not come out there. They would not engage in agricultural labor.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will permit me, I think I can give him some information on that point. The investigations of the commission developed very clearly the fact that the immigrants from eastern and southern Europe, although very largely made up of those who in the countries from which they came had been farm laborers, would not and could not be induced on reaching this country to go out individually and take labor on any of the American farms. I suppose that grew out of the fact that they were in a country to which they were strangers, among a people who spoke a different language, living under conditions entirely different from the conditions out of which they had come; and, in a spirit of timidity, they clung together in racial groups.

Moreover, a more significant fact came out a few years ago. I remember asking Mr. Watchorn when he was commissioner of immigration at the port of New York what proportion of the immigrants coming into this country came as a result of correspondence with somebody already in this country. I noticed that a great many of them when they landed at Ellis Island held railroad tickets from New York to some point in the United States to which they were destined. He kept an account for the next year, and reported to me that 80 per cent of all the immigrants landing at Ellis Island were when they came from the boats in possession of railroad tickets from New York to their place of destination. That was convincing proof of the fact that they were coming as a result of correspondence with a brother or a cousin or a friend. They knew just what labor conditions were in this country—where they could obtain labor—and they were going, as they reported when they landed, to meet friends. So they went where the people from their particular community in Europe had previously gone.

You will find if you will investigate the modern immigration that wherever the people from a certain part of Hungary went 15 years ago everybody from that section of Hungary has been going ever since—there becoming a part of a racial colony—and the same is true of other nationalities. As I have said several times since I have been speaking, modern immigration moves in groups, and they are mostly racial groups. They prefer to cling together and live in their old ways. You may take a man who belongs to one of these groups and offer him a good home on a New England farm where he can live in the family of his employer and have good board and a good bed, but you can not induce him to break away from friends and go there.

As an illustration of the fact, you all remember the great Lawrence strike. The strikers were living on what they called the strike wage, I suppose, and living very close. A friend of mine was building a railroad in Vermont, and was short of men. He visited Lawrence and applied to their leaders, as well as to men who were entirely out of employment. He offered them liberal wages and good boarding facilities, and held out every inducement possible, but he could not induce a man to break away from his associates and take advantage of the offer.

It is undoubtedly true that throughout the country agricultural laborers are more scarce than those of any other class. Every farmer feels the need of them. The Senator from Minnesota, in his remarks, reminded me of the fact that in 1907, when the bill of that year was under consideration it contained a provision which I had drafted carrying out precisely the idea which he has suggested of establishing a division in the Bureau of Immigration intended to divert the stream of immigration from the cities and send it to the country districts. It was adopted and is in the body of the law to-day. It has been in operation ever since. But aside from incidental successes it has been substantially a failure for the reason that I have suggested. The races coming here without their families and moving as I said in racial groups are so constituted that they will not go into the country and work as individuals. I do not think it possible to get individuals of the modern immigration to aid in the agriculture of America unless they are taken in colonies to some community where cottages for them have been prepared in which they can live their own lives instead of entering American families.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Recurring to what was said by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I have been a farm laborer myself, but that was a long time ago and the conditions then were altogether different from what they are now. I was not referring to work on the farm but to the kind of work mentioned by the Senator himself, digging canals and work upon railroads and labor of that kind. In my own city of Los Angeles most work of that kind is done by Mexican peons. As the Senator said, they congregate together. If a large number of them work, for example, on some railroad they provide homes for them. They are not very desirable homes. They congregate together, large numbers in one room. You see them at work and you may see other foreigners working with them. You may see a sprinkling of negroes with them when working in large bodies; but you will rarely see an American citizen working with that class of men. Americans regard it as beneath them. They do not like to work with that class of laborers. That is one of the great things, I think, that has crowded out American laborers.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I have said substantially all that I can say upon this subject and in urging that this bill shall receive consideration at this session of Congress. I can see no reason why it should not be considered, and I can see no reason why it should not receive the approval of the President at this time. In his message in which the bill of the last Congress was vetoed he said:

> It is because I doubt it that I make bold to dissent from it. I am willing to abide by the verdict, but not until it has been rendered.

He was referring to the verdict of the people. Then he adds:

> Let the platforms of parties speak out upon this policy and the people pronounce their wish.

Then he adds further:

> The matter is too fundamental to be settled otherwise.

In other words, although this measure had been approved by two separately elected Congresses of the United States fresh from the people, and who are supposed to represent the freshest expression of opinion by the people, he said that "the matter is too fundamental to be settled otherwise," and he wanted the platforms of the parties to speak out upon this policy. Well, I remember that back in 1896, as long ago as that, the Democratic Party in the platform of that year said:

> We hold that the most efficient way of protecting American labor is to prevent the importation of foreign pauper labor to compete with it in the home market.

That is just the idea that has been expressed by Democratic Senators in debate this afternoon; it is the opinion and judgment of both Republicans and Democrats, I take it, in this body. In that same year the Republican national platform contained this plank:

> For the protection of the quality of our American citizenship and of the wages of our workingmen against the fatal competition of low-priced labor, we demand that the immigration laws be thoroughly enforced and so extended—> so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States those who can neither read nor write.

Mark the words—

So the American people, through their two great parties, as early as 1896 had spoken upon this question.

In the Sixty-second Congress this measure was passed and vetoed not for adequate reasons, according to my judgment. In the Sixty-third Congress it again passed and was vetoed for the reason to which I have just referred. I think that as there has since been a fresh election and the Congress seems to be of the same opinion now that the last Congress entertained, the time has come to again pass this bill. I make that suggestion with the full belief that the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House will feel that the ground of his doubts has been removed and that he can approve this measure. I certainly hope it may be taken up and acted upon.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to remind the Senate that we have under consideration House bill 15455, which seems to have been entirely forgotten.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in regard to the shipping bill, which is now before the Senate, I had not intended, in view of the discussion which has been carried on from this side of the Chamber, to take an active part in the debate upon the bill; but there are one or two observations in connection with it that come to my mind, which I think it might be useful to put in the RECORD.

In the first place, I want to call attention to a feature of the present debate, which has been spoken of before, but which, I think, will bear repetition. That is the fact that in the debate upon this shipping bill, as in the debate upon the shipping bill the last time it was before the Senate, it has been the policy of the proponents of the bill to sit in substantial silence and to allow practically all the discussion upon it to be carried on upon this side of the Chamber. It seems to me that a bill of such far-reaching consequence as this, which proposes such a revolutionary organization and management of one of our chief industries, calls for a thorough presentation of the reasons for its introduction and the purposes involved in the policy which it incorporates.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The reason the majority does not present any arguments to the bill is that all their discussion on it occurred in a secret caucus.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, I am aware, Mr. President, that what the Senator from Pennsylvania says is largely true. It was true of the discussion that went on here for nearly a month on the shipping bill of a year ago, and it is true of the consideration of this similar bill at this time. I am particularly sorry that that is the situation, because it was my good fortune to be a member of the Committee on Commerce, which had this bill under its charge. I further had the good fortune to be appointed a member of the subcommittee of that committee of this body to which was given the particular duty of considering this bill for the purpose of reporting to the main committee.

In pursuance of the duties of that position, for nearly a month I listened to testimony from various people who came here to give their views in regard to this bill. I listened to the discussion that went on in the committee, and all the time I was trying to find a sufficient reason in the situation of business or in the exigencies of politics to account for this bill being presented to the Senate at all. Of course I was aware that its chief advocate was the Secretary of the Treasury, a gentleman who, from various causes, is in very close relation to the present administration. So far as the public discussion of this bill is concerned, he has been almost the only Democrat who has taken an active and conspicuous part. He has been, so far as I remember, looking back over the year of discussion that has gone on in opposition to the bill, the chief champion of it upon the Democratic side.

Mr. President, some three years ago there was another bill passed by the Senate, in regard to which I had the same feeling. I refer to the bill to construct a railroad by the Government in the far-off Territory of Alaska. I was a member of the Committee on Territories, to which that bill was referred. I listened to the testimony and took part in the discussion that went on in regard to that bill; and I never could understand why this administration wanted to undertake the construction of a railroad under the circumstances and conditions that prevail in Alaska.

I am aware that the argument presented for the undertaking was that such a monopoly existed in the transportation system of Alaska that it was necessary for the Government to interpose its powerful arm to bring relief; but, as a matter of fact, I know that the testimony which was before the committee on that point conclusively demonstrated that no such monopoly existed. I knew there were private parties ready to undertake the construction of an adequate transportation system in Alaska, provided that the facilities of Alaska were put in such shape that they might be used in the commerce of that country. Testimony was given over and over again that if the coal fields of Alaska were made available private capital would willingly build transportation systems in that Territory; and that unless the coal fields were made available, then Government construction would be as unsuccessful as the investment of private capital, for that purpose would be under the same conditions.

Mr. President, when the great Democratic commoner, Mr. Bryan, came back from a European trip some years ago and his devoted admirers prepared for him a great reception at Madison Square Garden in the metropolitan city of New York, he startled the country, and I think disappointed many of his admirers, by coming out as an eager and enthusiastic advocate of the Government ownership of railroads. It seemed to me, as I connected the two occurrences, that perhaps the influence of the then Secretary of State on the Democratic administration had not been without its effect in connection with the decision of the party at present in power to undertake this revolutionary investment of Government money in Alaska.

More recently I have listened with astonishment to the proposal, which has now been enacted into law by this Democratic Congress, to build with Government money—which means resources taken from individual business throughout the country—a Government armor plant. The testimony in regard to that proposal shows that we have in this country to-day, and have had for a quarter of a century, the most magnificent plant for the construction of armor that exists in the world; that it is ample for our needs, and, in fact, largely beyond any demand that has occurred for armor plate for several years back; that the quality of the armor plate which it produced was at least equal and, it is claimed, was superior to that produced in any other part of the world. The testimony was that the price at which the armor was sold to our Government was not over two-thirds the price that was paid for similar material in any part of the world by any other Government on earth. It was also testified that $30,000,000 had been invested in these plants, and that the construction of a Government owned plant, which would probably cost close to $20,000,000 under the conditions imposed in the bill, would destroy absolutely the privately owned plants; so that the cost to the people of the United States of the Government armor plant would not be the $20,000,000 of fresh money which would be put into it, but would be $50,000,000, including the loss incident to the destruction of the existing plants.

Then, Mr. President, I sat here and listened to the arguments that were made for another new venture in Government ownership, and I looked with astonishment upon the methods that were put in force to carry through this body a bill providing for the construction of a nitrate plant. Even at the very time when it was proposed to enter into this new Government operation there was private capital willing to go into it; and, in addition to that, there were people of the highest responsibility who said that a nitrate plant constructed on the plan proposed to be adopted by the Government would be useless, because the progress of modern chemistry and the discoveries of the last year or two had made obsolete the process that was proposed to be used in this Government plant. They did not hesitate to say to me that that plant would be antiquated before the roof was on the building, and that we might just as well, so far as any useful purpose could be accomplished, throw the money that was to be expended for it into the Potomac River.

Now, Mr. President, we come to another project for Government ownership. We come to the proposition to put $50,000,000 into Government-owned shipping, and the gentleman who has been its chief advocate, the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, in a speech which he made last winter in the West, used as an argument for the passage of this bill the fact that the Government had started to build a railroad in Alaska; and he argued, not illogically, that if it is wise for the Government to build railroads in Alaska—and if he had made the speech later he would probably have cited the action taken in regard to the armor plant and the nitrate factory in the South—why was it not equally wise for the Government to own shipping? Well, Mr. President, from the study which I have given to this matter, if we are to have Government-owned railroads and Government-owned shipping, and Government armor-plate factories and nitrogen factories, I can see no reason why we should not also have Government-owned cotton plantations for the purpose of reducing the cost of cotton to the people of this country and to the world, or why we should not have Government-owned copper mines and wheat fields and all the other instrumentalities of commerce. One business is no more susceptible of improvement by Government ownership than another and if Government ownership is so beneficial and is to be the policy of the United States, it should be a policy that is applied not to one single industry, but to all industries upon which the prosperity of this country depends.

It is true that the objections to Government ownership on the plea of additional expense are very many. I shall not undertake at this time to make an exhaustive presentation of that side of the subject, but as an example of what sometimes occurs under Government ownership I do want to lay before the Senate an illustration which has recently come within my own experience, and which I think aptly demonstrates what occurs when a great unwieldly organization, like a national government, undertakes to substitute for the individual initiative of private enterprise the efforts of a few paid Government employees who have no special incentive to progress.

There was recently built at the torpedo station in Rhode Island a very magnificent building for the manufacture of torpedoes. It is modern in every respect, suitable for the purposes in view, and it cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $250,000. It was completed last fall, nearly a year ago, but it stands there to-day unused and idle, because the Government, which appropriated the money of the people to construct that factory, failed to provide any machinery for it. In the naval appropriation bill, which was recently under consideration here, there is provided an appropriation of $100,000 for the purchase of machinery for that building, although, in order to secure the full benefit of the expenditure already made, it would be necessary to install machinery to the amount of some $250,000. The estimate from the officer in charge of the torpedo station at Newport, admittedly intended to provide only partially for the requirements of the factory, was for $189,000. That was cut down by the department in Washington, by the Secretary of the Navy, to $100,000. The matter came to my attention, and I took occasion to lay the facts before the distinguished Secretary of the Navy. He admitted the strength of them. He is himself somewhat of an advocate of Government ownership, and he could not very well resist the plea that a factory idle is a factory useless, whether owned by the Government or owned by an individual. After several interviews I persuaded him to write to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives a letter recommending that the appropriation contained in the then pending bill should be increased from $100,000 to the sum of the first estimate, $189,000. The letter was written, was presented to the chairman of the committee, and taken under consideration by the committee, and I supposed that with such backing and such influence there would be no difficulty in carrying out this project of efficiency.

To my surprise I discovered a little later that although the Secretary had written this letter and had approved of the project, his lieutenant, the Chief of Ordnance, Admiral Strauss, had appeared before the committee and said that the matter might just as well go over for another year. I brought the matter to the attention of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate and presented the arguments, and they unanimously included the appropriation for that purpose in the naval bill in the Senate, and it passed this body. Again, before the conference committee the argument was used from the same source, from the assistant of the man who had recommended it, that it could very well go over to another year.

Mr. President, as an example of Government ownership as compared with private ownership I want to present that case to the Senate. What private individual would dare to face his stockholders if he constructed a manufacturing building and waited for more than a year to give the order for the machinery to make it available and for machinery that it would probably take the better part of another year to construct and to install? The overhead charges on an idle building of this kind, including interest, taxes, repairs, depreciation, and so forth, would often be roughly figured in manufacturing circles as 10 per cent. If it is two years before suitable machinery is installed in this particular building, it will mean $50,000—one-fifth the cost of the plant—that has been absolutely thrown away.

Another instance of a somewhat similar nature in connection with the Navy Department has come to my attention. I use it not so much in criticism of the department as in illustration of the intricacies of Government ownership. It is in connection with the manufacture of powder by the Government—a matter which has been referred to more than once in this body. I am referring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy for the fiscal year 1915 and his remarks upon the subject of the profitableness of making powder. Mr. Daniels says that the cost in 1915 was 24.9 cents a pound; but he says that, of course, these figures represent merely the actual cost of materials and labor; that if the estimates for the overhead charges were added the cost would be 32.1 cents a pound. He then goes on to say that the last price at which powder had been bought from private concerns was 53 cents a pound, and inasmuch as the actual cost to the Navy was 25 cents the saving on the amount of powder that was manufactured was $1,115,793 for the year.

In other words, the Secretary of the Navy, in trying to make out a case for the Government manufacture of that article, after first admitting that the price to the United States was over 32 cents a pound, uses the figure of 25 cents a pound to measure the amount of saving that was made, because, as he says, that was the cost to the Navy, meaning the Navy Department. Mr. President, I have no doubt that that was the cost to the Navy Department, but it was not the cost to the people of the United States; and the people of the United States are as much interested in the expenses of the other departments of the Government as they are in the expenses of the Navy Department. They have to pay all the taxes that are necessary for all the departments; and when the representative of one of the great departments of this Government uses figures of that kind as an argument for Government ownership, I think it is at least worthy of attention and thought upon the part of the people who want to know the true facts in regard to this subject.

Mr. President, what I gather from all this is that we have here an administration the officials of which are subtly and quietly leading us along a path toward Government ownership, the end of which perhaps they do not exactly see; but they are incorporating into this Government a new principle of deep import which ought to be argued on its merits, and it is a situation into which the country should not be allowed to drift. If, indeed, Government ownership is the proper substitute for the individual initiative which has developed in this country a great variety of resources and produced a prosperity that is the wonder of the civilized world, then we should go into it intelligently, thoroughly, and consistently.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am curious to know whether, in the overhead charges, the items are given in the Secretary's report which bring the cost of powder to 32 cents and a fraction per pound. I am curious to know how the Secretary figures the overhead charges, and I should like to know the items, if they are contained in the report.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator that he will find all of this on page 58 of the report to which I referred. The detail of those overhead charges is not given, but enough is given to show that those charges do not include the entire overhead charges such as would be figured by a private owner. Here is what the Secretary says about it:

> The Bureau of Ordnance estimates that the overhead charges (including pay and allowance of officers, pensions, leave, etc.) aggregate $0.072243.

There is no mention made of taxes, of insurance, or of depreciation. I am not sure whether any allowance has been made for these items. In fact, as I look further at the report of the Secretary, he says that to this additional cost that brings the total to 32 cents should be added the interest on the plant investment, in which case the total would be 34 cents per pound. But there is apparently no thought of insurance, depreciation, or other similar items. I have no doubt the overhead charges stated here are considerably less than the proper sum that should be allowed for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inquire further if the Senator knows of any successful private business enterprise in which each year there is not some depreciation written off in order to replace the ordinary wear and use that finally destroy a plant?

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in my commercial experience I have known of several large corporations that failed because of failure to do it, but I do not know of one that ever succeeded while failing to do it. It is, of course, a practice that is indefensible.

Mr. SHERMAN. If all those charges that ordinarily belong to a successfully conducted private business were added as overhead charges, does not the Senator think that the cost of powder would exceed even the 34 cents?

Mr. LIPPITT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHERMAN. And even with the 32 cents, the difference between the 24 cents and a fraction and the 32 cents is almost one-third of the amount paid by the Government.

Mr. LIPPITT. Exactly. Those figures were brought to my attention some little time ago, and I thought it was one of the most naïve financial statements I had ever come across; and it seemed to me particularly appropriate that it should be put in the RECORD in considering such a subject as that of government ownership.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is vital on the subject of government ownership. I wish to inquire if the Senator has investigated the matter of municipal ownership in various cities? I know I have, and I have found in every instance that they do not replace the property, they do not make charges for capital invested, and do not make charges for compensation insurance for the workmen or insurance on the property. In estimating the overhead charges in a private business they invariably include those items, while in estimating the price of the commodity or service the municipality or the Government always claims a much lower rate than in fact would be shown if there were accurate business methods of bookkeeping followed. That is generally the case.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator that I am not particularly familiar with the matter to which he refers, but I believe that that is usually the case.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has been my experience in every case of a municipality that I have investigated. I know that several of our municipalities in my home State have undertaken enterprises of that kind, and have made considerable advertising capital out of the cost of gas and electric light or water, as the case may be. Water, however, is one of the easiest of all the municipal undertakings, and in a manner is very successful; but when investigated it was found that there was none of these charges allowed for, no overhead charges, and the low cost of the article or the service took no account of these items that are indispensable in the successful conduct of a private business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I must apologize, to a certain degree, for my inattention. I wanted to ask the Senator at what date those prices of 24 and 32 cents, respectively, obtained?

Mr. LIPPITT. Those figures refer to the fiscal year 1915—that is, the year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator give his opinion on this query: Is it not a fact that the price of powder in the trade operated by private capital, which was then quoted at 53 cents, was considerably higher than it would have been in normal times; that had it not been for the great European war making an enormous demand for powder, it is safe to say that the price of powder manufactured by a private plant would have been below 53 cents? In other words, the Government plant is not subject to the law of supply and demand, and the private plant is.

Mr. LIPPITT. That would be the case if the Secretary had used the commercial price of powder in the figures with which he made his comparison; but the price of 53 cents was the lowest price that had been paid by the Government at any time. The Senator from New York will understand that this was for smokeless powder of a high quality. It was originally supplied to the Government at the beginning of its discovery at a very materially higher price. The figures are given somewhere here, and I think it was in the neighborhood of $1. From time to time, as the experience of the manufacturer grew, I presume, and the method of manufacture was improved by experience, those prices were reduced until the price of 53 cents was made at the time that the Government went into the manufacture of powder; and that price, as I understand, has been continued at the service of the Government by the powder manufacturers instead of the price that they are getting, as the Senator from New York well says—a very much higher price—from other parties, owing to the exigencies of the war.

Mr. President, what I have been describing is one of the circumstances that at least is worthy of consideration in considering this shipping bill. I want now to go on for a few minutes to consider some of the reasons that have been given for the passage of this bill in the few remarks that have been made upon it by its advocates on the other side.

Almost the only presentation of the subject was by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] at the time this bill was first laid before the Senate. In his remarks upon the subject he devotes almost one-third of the space which he gives to it to the importance of a naval auxiliary, and the implication is suggested that the purpose of this bill and the excuse for the investment of this money is the necessity for naval auxiliaries.

When it is difficult to get sufficient reasons for a project on its own merits it is a very familiar method to bring into the subject collateral and unimportant arguments. The attempt to vindicate this bill on the ground that we are in this way going to obtain sufficient and satisfactory naval auxiliaries is shown by the language of the bill itself to be unfounded. All that the bill has to say on the subject of naval auxiliaries is in section 5, where it says that the vessels to be purchased, leased, or chartered shall be—

> Suitable, as far as the commercial requirements of the marine trade of the United States may permit, for use as naval auxiliaries or Army transports, or for other naval or military purposes.

In other words, the language of the bill and the intent of the bill is to produce commercial ships; and commercial ships, in order to be useful, must be specially designed with reference to the commercial purposes to which they are to be put. In fact, one argument that has been used for this bill outside of this Chamber was made by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, who attempted to show that, under the wise leadership of Government experts, a new class of vessels was to be created in the world—standardized ships, as he called them, that were to be built on but a single model, and specially adapted by new methods to the purposes of commerce; so that the money of the Government would be spent not merely for ships but for commercial ships so particularly designed and constructed for commercial purposes that they would have an advantage from that feature alone.

It is impossible to get the highest efficiency in ships for commerce if they are to be specially designed for naval purposes—if there is to be additional expense in their construction so that they may fit some particular naval purpose—and there is nothing in the language of this bill which contemplates such an interference with the efficiency of these vessels. On the other hand, the language implies exactly the opposite purpose—that these vessels are to be built primarily for commercial purposes, and, if it can be done without expense and without interfering with their highest efficiency, then they may be adapted, so far as they can be under those conditions, to naval purposes.

Moreover, if the object of this bill is to provide naval auxiliaries, then the bill should have other provisions in it. Naval auxiliaries are specialized vessels in many cases, and those special features are such that we have to rely upon naval constructors, naval experts, for information as to how to produce them. There is no provision in this bill that the shipping board shall in any way work in harmony or in sympathy with the strategy board of the Navy or with the officers of the Navy. There is no provision for consulting them or in any way obtaining their advice or following their instructions. Therefore it seems to me that to base the argument for this bill on the purely subsidiary possibility that such vessels may be used for naval auxiliaries is neither in accordance with the spirit nor the language of the measure.

The next argument that is used by the distinguished Senator for the passage of this bill is that we are unable to obtain ships in ordinary times for the carrying of our trade to foreign ports, and particularly to South America. He urges the importance and necessity of supplying means of transportation to those nations to the south of us, and he says that because we have not had these ships we have obtained but a small share of the trade of our southern neighbors, and that the reason why Germany and France and Great Britain obtain a larger proportion of their trade is because they are supplied with steamers running on regular schedules.

Mr. President, it is easy to make statements of that kind. They are supported by no array of statistics from the shipping trade. The Senator does not take the trouble to put into the RECORD the kind of American ships, the number of ships, or the ports to which such ships were sailing during the period immediately antedating the war; and I use that period because it is manifestly useless for a bill of this kind to consider the extraordinary conditions of war times.

But during the discussion that went on over this same subject in the last Congress it so happened that there was a Senator here representing the great State of Ohio, whose knowledge of these subjects was unrivaled by any man that ever sat in this body and whose industry was phenomenal. Senator Burton during the very thorough discussion which he made on this subject at that time did not rely upon unsupported statements to maintain the position which he took. He put into the RECORD—and any Senator who is curious to examine them may find them in the RECORD of January 7, 1915—a complete list of all the vessels that had sailed during the first nine months of 1914 from America to South American ports. He gives their names, their destination, their size, and other details in regard to them; and what is demonstrated from that array of figures is the fact that we not only were not short of vessels to take care of the merchandise that this country was able to sell to South America, but that we were so oversupplied with them that many of the vessels were forced to sail with only partial cargoes, and in many cases they sailed with these partial cargoes, although their ordinary sailing dates were put back in the hope of getting a more remunerative amount of merchandise. The situation which he described and demonstrated to have existed at that time was not unusual; it was not exceptional. It had existed in our relations between South American ports and this country for some considerable time.

Therefore, Mr. President, I can not see how the necessities of our South American trade can be made the sufficient argument for enacting this revolutionary bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do.

Mr. JONES. Is there anything in the bill from which anyone can conclude that any of the ships are going to be used in the South American trade?

Mr. LIPPITT. Nothing at all, I will say to the Senator from Washington. There is nothing in the bill which indicates at all what is to be done with them, and that difficulty was apparently present in the minds of the framers of the bill, because while urging it on the ground that we need these vessels in our foreign trade they provide that in case of necessity, even if built abroad in foreign shipyards, they may enter our domestic trade. Manifestly the gentlemen who conceived this measure had no definite use for these vessels, or if they had they have not been frank enough to explain it to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. If the vessels are leased, the lessees are likely to take them where they would get the greatest return.

Mr. LIPPITT. That would seem to be the ordinary commercial process.

Mr. JONES. If there is no established business between this country and South America, that is likely to be about the last place where they would be taken, is it not?

Mr. LIPPITT. That is what I should suppose. I had supposed that to be the fact until I heard the brief argument that was made in behalf of this measure by the senior Senator from Georgia, who declared that the purposes of this bill were to regulate the price, the cost, of shipping transportation; that when these vessels were leased they would be leased upon the condition on the part of the Government that they must run in this trade or that; that the destination and the use of the vessels would be stipulated at the time the lease was made; and that instead of being put into our commerce to be used here and there as the exigencies of that commerce might demand they would be used for the arbitrary purpose of making shipping less attractive to American owners, even though the bill provides specifically that fighting ships, so called, shall not be used by private owners. Apparently it is the idea of the Senator from Georgia that these Government-owned ships are to have a license to do the very thing that is forbidden to private individuals; they are to be used by the Government as fighting ships here and there where for the time being shipping seems to be profitable.

Mr. JONES. Would not that subject the Government to the penalties provided in the bill for using fighting vessels?

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Washington is a lawyer. I think I will discuss this bill from a commercial standpoint.

Another argument that the Senator from North Carolina used in reference to this matter was to congratulate himself that the bill his party has now presented to the Senate is radically different from the bill which they attempted to pass here a year ago. He urges the members of his own party to give it their unanimous support because he says that all the things that were objected to by the distinguished Democratic Senators who were unable to support the shipping bill last year are no longer included in this bill.

Mr. President, the bill that was presented here last year was constantly modified and changed to meet the political emergencies of the situation. I think there were some six different bills that were presented here at one time and another during the course of that debate in the hope of obtaining sufficient support for the measure.

It rather seems to me as I look back and remember the bitter criticism that was made of the Republicans of this body last year for their opposition to the prototype of this measure that the confession here of the Senator from North Carolina is an ample vindication of the course they took. If he can congratulate himself now that the bill, which a more ripened experience has placed before the Senate, does not contain the very things that the Republicans of the last Congress so valiantly and determinedly opposed as unwise, if a similar discussion could be had on this bill in this Congress, if it could be fairly participated in by the Senators on both sides of this body so that the details of it might be fairly examined and judged, is it not possible the country would be saved again as it was a year ago from the enactment of law that a year later the same Democracy will be sorry they are responsible for?

Of course, in considering this bill at the present time we can not escape the influence of the atmosphere by which we are surrounded. The present situation of shipping the world over has been one of extraordinary scarcity of vessels and of an extraordinarily high range of prices, and it has not escaped the attention of the proponents of this measure that in that situation there might be found some excuse for Government assistance. The plea that it is an emergency measure was made for the predecessor of this bill a year ago and it is made now.

It is true, Mr. President, that very high prices have been in existence for the better part of two years in the shipping business, but it is also true that apparently the apex of that situation has been reached. For the last two or three months there have been steadily declining prices for ocean transportation. I have here an article from the Boston News Bureau of July 6, a month ago, in which is given the prices for various kinds of merchandise in foreign trade and the high prices which were reached in March, 1916. I find from this source that a month ago the price for grain per bushel was 20 cents from Boston to Liverpool, as compared with 48 cents in March; that general provisions and pail lard and hard lumber were at the same prices at that time as previously, $1.25, $1.31, and $1.50 per hundred pounds, respectively. Butter, however, could be carried for $1.75, as compared with $2; oil cake for 61 cents, as compared with $1; cotton for $1, as compared with $2.50; and tobacco for $2.50, as compared with $3.

Those figures were the figures of a month ago. Two or three days ago it occurred to me to see if I could obtain more recent figures. I wrote to a firm of ship brokers in New York, who are perhaps in as close connection with this subject as any people in America, and whom I have always found to be extremely well informed on everything connected with the business in which they are engaged, and I asked them if they would give me the prices of that day as compared with the highest prices for some of the representative articles. They replied that the prices of August 7 for wheat to the United Kingdom from New York was 34 cents, as compared with 54 cents at the highest; to France it was 37 cents, as compared with 57 cents; and to Italy it was 42 cents, as compared with 72 cents. Those were the prices of the regular liners. I asked them again if they could tell me what was the condition among the tramp steamers.

I find from their reply that the condition of the tramp has followed the same course as that of the regular liners. For instance, they say that flour to France from New York was at one time at as high a rate as $1.50 a hundred pounds and it has now declined to $1; that coal to Argentina was $22 per ton and it is now $15; and so on, with some other items, the condition of which does not differ from those to which I have called attention.

So I infer that so far as an emergency is concerned with reference to the present war conditions it is not necessary for us to resort to this measure. The ordinary processes of commerce are meeting that emergency; they are relieving the situation; and while the prices are far from being normal at the present time it is nevertheless true that there is being transported back and forth from this country the largest foreign commerce that the country has ever seen. I believe it amounts in value to some $6,000,000,000, which is, I understand, some 50 per cent higher than the highest point which we had reached before the war.

Under those circumstances, it does not seem as though this measure could be explained and excused on the ground that an emergency exists so unsupportable that we can not rely in this instance as we have in so many others in the commerce of the world upon the law of supply and demand to bring, in a reasonable time, a reasonable remedy.

Of course, Mr. President, the real essence of this bill is the question of the wisdom of taking such a large sum as $50,000,000 from the ordinary channels of commerce to be diverted to this particular use and put under this extraordinary management. Before the present administration came into power $50,000,000 was looked upon as a somewhat large appropriation. There were very few Republicans who had the temerity to come here and propose that such a sum as $50,000,000 should be withdrawn from private ownership and put at the disposal of the Government. Such a proposal in what now looks like the halcyon days of the past, would have met long and serious debate in this body. But we seem to have become somewhat accustomed to making these demands upon the resources of our people for experimental purposes.

We have an administration whose god seems to be something new. It started in office with the promise of a "new freedom," which, in the end, seems to be rather a freedom for foreign nations to have the benefit of our domestic markets instead of reserving them for our own people. Sometime after that the Republicans of this body and of this country were criticized because, as it was asserted, for half a century they had never proposed any new thing and because they selected nobody but grandfathers for counselors. So this new idea of appropriating $50,000,000, without explanation and without discussion, is not now so startling as it would have been in the older days. To my mind, however, it requires an ample vindication before it becomes an accomplished fact. To me it is a very serious matter to employ this large sum in a business the advocates of which admit will be transacted at a loss. The distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, the chief advocate and champion of this measure, admitted in his defense of it last winter that the business could not be conducted at a profit. He attempted to find other benefits that would compensate for the loss, but, as it seemed to me, without a great degree of success. Certainly if the Government is to adopt the policy of the public management of some portions of private industries, at least it should be able to show or claim that their management would be followed by what is the standard of private management; that is, the transaction of the business at a profit.

I see no difference between taking this sum of $50,000,000—which is large in itself, but small as compared with the industry in which it is to be put—and placing it at the disposal of some favored few, either by leasing vessels to them or selling vessels to them, at an assumed cost to the Government lower than other parties can build or afford to lease for, I can see no difference between that proposition and a subsidy. It has all the worst features of a subsidy, because the disposition which is to be made of these vessels by lease, which is the first way that the bill provides for their use, is not to be governed by some rule prescribed by law, but will be at the option of the shipping board that is to have this subject in charge.

There is another feature of the bill which seems to me very indefensible. The bill comprises two distinct portions designed to accomplish two distinct and unrelated purposes. One is the regulation of shipping; the other is the management of a particular line of vessels. One is a commercial operation; the other is a judicial operation. This same board which the bill constitutes has the control and the management of both branches of the subject. As the owners of $50,000,000 of shipping, with the duty of operating it to the best advantage, which the circumstances will enable them to do, they are on the same basis as is any other owner of vessels in the United States, or at least ought to be. They will have to go to the same customers to obtain cargoes. They will transport those cargoes from the same port of origin to the same port of destination, and on competitive terms.

It seems to me manifestly improper that all the activities of private shipowners in this country shall be turned over for regulation and for judicial consideration to one of their competitors, as this bill does. Certainly it would seem like a monstrous thing if the Government of the United States made the officers of the International Mercantile Marine the judges of what was fair competition on the part of all the other American shipowners. Nevertheless, that is the situation in which this bill puts the shipping industry of this country as regards the shipping board. It has charge of the entire regulation of the industry, in which it is itself a competitor.

We do not find that this same Democratic Party, whose first attempt at Government ownership was the Alaska Railroad, put the construction and management of that road into the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the regulatory board for the railroads. Why, then, should the shipping industry be treated in a different manner?

The ostensible purpose of this bill is to help the development of American shipping. If it is in reality to help that development, its provisions must be such as to inspire confidence in those engaged in the industry; its provisions must be such as to insure a belief that there will be fair treatment and impartial judgment. There is not a witness, so far as I know, who came before the committee and testified on this subject, who approved of this dual capacity of the shipping board. The constant tenor of the testimony of the witnesses was that the effect of this bill would be to discourage the creation of a privately owned American commercial marine.

Any industry which is international in its character, in which one nation or another has a widely different participation, should be managed with some regard to the methods employed by that country which has the principal interest. The shipping industry of the world is largely in the hands of England.

That industry has been for centuries encouraged and developed by her statesmen, not only as a great source of her prosperity and her revenue, but on the far more important ground that it was the bulwark of her safety. England must have shipping at whatever price she has to pay for it. She must be the owner of a very large proportion of the shipping of the world, if her people are to maintain their position either in commerce or as one of the great nations of the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if he has observed from the utterances of many of the public men in the English Parliament and at the head of various departments of government in England a change in the policy of that Government? They have learned that they must not be dependent for foodstuffs upon foreign countries, and are now advocating the development of the agricultural resources of England and the utilization of land which has been devoted to game preserves and which has been lying idle, because England, with her shipping facilities, could bring from distant places breadstuffs and meat cheaper than she could raise them at home. Has the Senator noticed that tendency among the public men of England in the last 12 months?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; I have, I will say to the Senator from Illinois; and it very suggestive of the growing realization by England of the advantages of being self-sustaining. I was going to say a word or two about that a little later on.

I was referring at the time the Senator from Illinois interrupted me to the importance to England of the shipping industry; and the thought I was trying to convey was not alone that the methods which her experience has taught her were wise to employ and which her success in creating a controlling position in that industry justify were worthy of our consideration in framing a bill of this kind, but, further, that inevitably the regulations and methods of conducting the shipping business which the major factor in that business establishes must be the controlling and influencing method of shipping management.

So long as England has the position of supremacy in the shipping business, just so long must her methods in conducting it influence the methods of every other nation that undertakes to engage actively in it. It is true that if a nation can devise a more economical method or a more inviting method—a method that will give them some advantage in competition—they may adopt such a method successfully; but they can not successfully adopt a method that is less efficient, that is more exacting, that is less inviting to private enterprise, for it is manifest that if they do their shipping will labor under a commercial disadvantage compared to the shipping of their largest competitor.

The regulations which the shipping board are empowered and instructed to put in force will be somewhat hard for the shippers to bear; they will be somewhat expensive to them; and I want to make the point that, if we really are going to attempt to encourage shipping, we must study and imitate the methods of the other shipping countries of the world.

There are two other provisions in this bill which seem to me also to be most indefensible. I refer to the provision which provides that this board shall be allowed to build ships in foreign yards unless they can obtain their construction in American yards on equal terms, and to the provision that allows those vessels so constructed to enter into our coastwise trade.

I do not know, of course, how binding the men who may be appointed to this shipping board will consider that expression of "equal terms" to be. It would seem to imply that it would be their duty, at any time that a vessel could be obtained from England or Germany or Norway or Sweden at 1 per cent better advantage than she could be obtained in the United States, to place the business abroad.

I can not believe that the proper method to encourage our shipping is by inviting foreign competition of that kind through the agency of a board of this character. Moreover, our coastwise shipping has been of the greatest value to us for the very purpose that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina made the chief ground of his support of the measure. What little auxiliary assistance to the Navy we have comes from the fact that we have along our coasts and on our Great Lakes and rivers a magnificent maritime industry. Its tonnage is of such size that it would be a magnificent addition to the tonnage of any other nation in the world, and in consequence of it we have a force of experienced, trained navigators and sailors among our people, accustomed to the intricacies of navigation along our coasts, who know the lights, who know the channels, who know the operation of the tides and the prevailing winds, and are able to carry on our coastwise shipping with the maximum of safety.

It seems to me that to open this door for attack upon the shipping we have is one of the most reprehensible features of this measure. At least I had supposed when it was under consideration that one department of American-built and American-owned commerce would be safe from assault. If there is anything in the doctrine of a self-sustaining nation, then Americans ought to retain that coastwise shipping.

Mr. President, while I have now discussed this bill at some length, there are other points in connection with it that, if I had time, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate, and on the point which I am now discussing much more can be properly said; but the time has nearly arrived when the Senate will adjourn for the day, and I understand there are other matters that should occupy its attention, so I yield the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as bearing on some of the questions asked in the debate with regard to the reasons for the languishing of the American merchant marine, and something of the history of its rise and fall—particularly its fall—I should like to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, pages 34, 35, and 36 of the report on "Government aid to merchant shipping." It is a report from the Department of Commerce, No. 119, of the special agents' series.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator means in his own remarks, not in mine?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I am doing that on my own account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

For many years prior to the Civil War the merchant marine of the United States was second only to that of Great Britain, and the bulk of the foreign trade of this country as well as much of the trade of other countries was carried in American bottoms. That was the period of the wooden sailing ship, which could be built more cheaply by the American shipbuilder than by foreign constructors, and which could be handled more efficiently by American sailors than by foreign sailors. The shipping industry was, moreover, one of the few important industries of the young Nation, and it offered a profitable field for the employment of American capital and labor. With the advent of the iron steamship the advantage of the American shipbuilder and shipowner was largely curtailed. The English builder could secure iron plates for hull and boiler more cheaply than his American rival, for the iron industry was developed much earlier in England than in the United States. Moreover, the British shipowner was keen to take advantage of the opportunity offered by the use of iron ships, while American shipowners were satisfied with the advantages which their fast clipper ships then gave them. It is not surprising, therefore, that as the superiority of iron ships came to be appreciated English shipping forged ahead and American shipping fell behind. This process had been under way, so far as over-seas shipping is concerned, for some time before the beginning of the Civil War.

The war merely accelerated the relative decline of American shipping. Not only was a large amount of tonnage destroyed on the high seas during the war, but a large amount (about 750,000 tons—Annual Report of Commissioner of Navigation, 1915, pp. 214–215) was transferred to foreign registry to avoid capture and destruction, and after the close of the war this tonnage was never permitted to be registered in the United States.

By as much as the over-seas shipping of the United States was diminished by the war, that of foreign countries, particularly Great Britain, was increased. The hold upon the carrying trade of the world which Great Britain then secured has never been relinquished and never seriously threatened.

The United States might have regained much of the ground lost during the war, (a) if the law of February 10, 1866 (R. S., 4135), prohibiting the return to American registry of ships that had held American registers and had given them up for foreign registers during the war, had not been passed; (b) if interest in the internal development of the country had not been so absorbing; (c) if the dominant protectionist theories had not been antagonistic to foreign trade; (d) if American shipowners had not clung so tenaciously to the clipper ships; (e) if American shipowners had not been restricted to domestic yards for the construction of their ships; and (f) if American shipowners had been in a position to take advantage of the opportunities offered by the change of the commerce and the trade routes of the world consequent upon the substitution of steam for sail and, later, upon the opening of the Suez Canal.

To do more than enumerate the causes for the decline of the over-seas shipping of the United States is not expedient in a report of this character. Nevertheless it is necessary to bear these facts in mind in considering ways and means by which the over-seas shipping under the American flag may be extended.

Within recent years conditions have changed greatly. Many of the adverse factors enumerated above have been converted into positive and favorable factors.

(a) As a result of the passage of the ship-registry act of August 18, 1914, the American shipowner is free to buy his ships in the cheapest market and American registry is no longer denied to foreign-built ships owned by American citizens. Between the date of this act and May 12, 1916, 180 foreign-built ships, with a total gross register tonnage of 617,183, were added to the over-sea shipping under the United States flag.

(b) Interest in the internal development of the country is no longer so absorbing as to preclude interest in over-seas trade, and large amounts of American capital have been put into ships, practically all of which sailed under foreign flags until the passage of the law of August 18, 1914. For example, the Standard Oil interests, the United Fruit Co., the United States Steel Products Co., W. R. Grace & Co., and other important American concerns had large fleets of vessels under the flags of foreign nations.

(c) The country has thrown off the influence of certain phases of the extreme protectionist system which were long and unduly emphasized by the leading exponents of that system and discouraged maritime enterprise. This point is well brought out in David A. Wells's essay on the Decay of Our Ocean Mercantile Marine, Its Cause and Cure, in which he quotes from the writings and speeches of Henry C. Carey, Horace Greeley, William P. Frye, and other leading protectionists. A system of protection so high as virtually to shut out imports could hardly be promotive of much foreign shipping, for ships require return as well as outbound cargoes to be run economically.

To-day the country is, on the whole, favorable to the development and expansion of its foreign trade, which is coming to consist, on the import side of the balance sheet, more and more of raw and partly manufactured products and, on the export side, more largely of finished manufactured products. American industry is now organized on a big production basis, and the home market, great as it is, is no longer able to absorb the whole production of many lines of manufacture. Many of the large plants, it is claimed, can be run at the greatest efficiency only when operated at maximum capacity; but this brings about a production in excess of domestic requirements. Moreover, the tendency is for exports of breadstuffs to decrease, which means that larger exports of other products, mineral and manufactured, are required to liquidate this country's indebtedness to the rest of the world for supplies of coffee, tea, cocoa, raw silk, jute, Egyptian cotton, hides, rubber, tin, antimony, nitrates, potash, and other raw materials not produced in this country, as well as for manufactured products, such as dyestuffs, that are more economically produced abroad, and to pay the interest on the investments that other countries have made in the United States and to provide the money expended by American travelers in Europe.

(d) American shipbuilders have long since given up the clipper ship and are now showing as much enterprise as foreign shipbuilders in the development and utilization of steamships. The expansion of the American Navy and of the coasting trade has given American shipyards much work to do, and has recently made possible the standardization of ship construction, which English yards have practiced for years and which has enabled American shipyards along the Great Lakes to produce great ore-carrying vessels as rapidly and as cheaply as it is possible for them to be produced.

The price of ship plates is now somewhat lower in the United States than in Great Britain, which is a reversal of former conditions. Moreover, the steel industry of this country, which is now highly organized and extensive, is in a position to render more effective assistance than formerly in the development of the shipbuilding industry. This assistance should be particularly valuable in the construction of the proposed standardized ship with a hull built of structural steel cut to the proper length at the mill and merely put together at the shipyard, in the same manner as the framework of a skyscraper is raised. The extensive use of structural steel, resulting in large-scale production, is essentially an American practice, and the idea of a standardized ship built of structural steel is also of American origin. It is clear, therefore, that if this new type of ship should prove as successful as it gives promise of doing the American shipbuilding industry would have, for a time at least and at a most auspicious time, a marked advantage.

(e) American shipping has now an opportunity such as that enjoyed by Great Britain 50 years ago. The opportunity comes at a time when American citizens owning foreign-built ships can ply them under the American flag, when interest in foreign trade is widespread and the necessity for foreign markets clearly recognized, and when the profitableness of shipping under present conditions is alluring.

(f) At this time, too, certain new trade routes may be opened up with marked advantage. For example, the west coast of South America imports large quantities of coal, which have come largely from Australia and Wales. Since the construction of efficient coal-carrying railroads, such as the Norfolk & Western, the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Virginian, and the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio, Virginia steam coal of excellent quality can be delivered at low cost at the Atlantic seaboard ports of Norfolk, Newport News, and Charleston, where it can be transferred from car to vessel quickly, efficiently, and at low cost. It is believed that increasingly large quantities of this coal can be sold in Chile and Peru at lower cost than Australian or Welsh coal. If this proves to be the case, the vessels carrying coal from the United States can return with nitrates from Chile, copper from American-owned mines and smelters in Chile and Peru, tin ore from American-owned mines in Bolivia, and iron ore from American-owned mines in Chile.

The development of exports of coal would cause reductions in return freights—a factor which goes far toward accounting for the maritime supremacy of Great Britain—and an extension of American shipping.

Emphasis has been laid on these facts and probabilities chiefly for the purpose of showing that natural conditions and legislation now favor the development of the American merchant marine to a greater degree than they formerly impeded that development—a fact of great importance in considering whether or not and to what extent, if any, the Government should offer direct financial assistance to American shipping.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. PENROSE. I take this opportunity to present the views of the minority members of the Finance Committee on the revenue bill (S. Rept. 793, pt. 2). I think the chairman of the committee is about to make the report of the majority of the committee in a few minutes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see the chairman present. He can do that later.

Mr. PENROSE. Is the Senator from Florida contemplating an adjournment at this time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to have a short executive session.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from North Carolina can make his report in executive session.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 298) providing for the relief of flood sufferers in the State of West Virginia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Humboldt County, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of El Monte, Cal., praying for the settlement of the difficulties between the railroads and their employees by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Photo Engravers' Union of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry employees of the Federal building custodian's force, of Topeka, Kans., praying for an increase in their wages, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LANDS IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21) authorizing the city of Salida, Colo., to purchase certain public lands for public park purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 799) thereon.
